COMMENT OF THE DAY
THE UNIONS

Let us say right away that in common with all informed opinion of democratic principle, we believe in the privilege of Labour to organise. United in the common purpose of increasing the standard of living; united to promote such institutions which provide education, welfare, and cultural centres for the worker, we see nothing but good in it.

In stating this opinion, we are saying no more than history could have us say. None who has read the dreadful accounts of the conditions of Labour a century ago in England could hold any opinion but that stated here. However, circumstances are that the whole situation must now be reviewed in the light of the irresponsible attitude taken both by leaders of Labour, and many of their thoughtless followers.

Why did Labour organise originally? It was to defeat sectional interests. The ordinary working man as an individual was helpless before the combination of capital which overworked and underpaid him. Labour did not gain her victories easily. Powerful institutions fought every Bill that went to the Houses of Parliament, but gradually, over the century, everything that was asked for was won, including the nationalisation of certain industries.

But unfortunately, this advance in the promotion of better working conditions has not been accompanied by a greater intelligent appreciation of the conditions, nor the circumstances, which must of necessity accompany such reforms.

In assuming power and policy in industry, the workers must assume responsibility for the economies which are related to his wages and conditions. Labour has gained more than it dreamed of, but is now using these powers just as the capitalists did in the days of the Industrial Revolution. Labour said: "We must combine to defeat sectional interests." Labour has now combined to gain sectional interests without thought of the country's economic future, and without regard for her fellows.

In short, trades unions have taken on the likeness of the pest they set out to destroy, but the point they cannot see is, in working only for sectional interests, they will destroy themselves for if they injure British economy, they injure themselves.

Not Safe To Abandon Manned Aircraft

London, May 9. Air Chief Marshal Sir Ronald Ivelaw-Chapman, former Deputy Chief of Britain's Air Staff, said in a broadcast tonight that he could not imagine a time when it would be safe to completely abandon the manned bomber or fighter.

He also suggested that guided missiles would not be developed so soon as some people were inclined to think, "probably later rather than earlier in the 1960's."

The Air Chief Marshal said that because the guided missiles had economic advantages over manned aircraft, the aim must be eventually to rely on it—but not before it had been developed.

The changeover to predominantly unmanned aircraft would be staggered over as much as a decade and would come considerably more quickly for fighters than bombers.

Deportation Order Stayed

Los Angeles, May 9. The US Immigration Service today held an appeal filed by Leslie Colin Jabara, 30, a great-great-grandson of a signer of the Declaration of Independence, against an order issued by the Service deporting him to Australia.

The Immigration officials maintained that Jabara had obtained Australian passports for a number of years and was in the US at the present time on an Australian passport.

It ruled that this cost him his right to American citizenship.

Trade With China Union Wants Restrictions Removed

Great Yarmouth, May 9. The Amalgamated Engineering Union conference here today called for removal of restrictions and embargoes on trade with the Soviet Union and China.

They unanimously passed a resolution supporting a policy of trade with all countries.

Mr Bill Carron, AEU President, declared: "We are not concerned so much with East-West trade or North-South trade as long as we can get work into our workshops for our members."

"We have no interest at all in purely political slogans. If we as an executive could send a delegation to Russia or China as a trading mission, we feel we could bring back orders for Britain."

"But that is a very remote possibility indeed."—Reuter.

FRENCH CRISIS

Pflimlin To Try His Hand

Paris, May 9. M. Pierre Pflimlin, latest candidate for the premiership in the 24-day-old French political crisis, was encouraged today by the Socialist and Conservative leaders, M. Guy Mollet and M. Antoine Pinay, to persist in his efforts to form a government.

He was expected to inform President Coty later tonight that he would undertake the task.

M. Mollet told M. Pflimlin that he could rely on the voting support of the Socialists, though they "would not participate in the Cabinet."

M. Pinay said he was sure that many of his political friends were anxious to see the end of the crisis and would be prepared to back the 51-year-old Catholic leader.

LITTLE PLUM

M. Pflimlin—his name means "little plum"—plans a small cabinet, which may consist entirely of members of his own party, MRG, to carry through a three-point "action programme."

★ 1. Sustained military effort in Algeria to place the French Government in a sufficiently strong position to engage in ceasefire parleys at the hour of its own choice.

★ 2. Restriction of home consumption and extra taxation to cover additional military expenditure.

★ 3. Constitutional reform to strengthen the executive and to set up institutions for a Franco-African Commonwealth.

Algeria will be M. Pflimlin's most difficult problem—as it was for M. Rene Pleven, who was forced to give up yesterday when ready to present his government to the National Assembly.

M. Pflimlin is reported to be contemplating being his own Minister for Algeria.

This would not suit the Conservatives, who regard his views on Algeria as liberal.

Their Parliamentary group issued a warning today insisting on the maintenance of a resident cabinet minister in Algeria, and the retaining of France's "pledges" (meaning the aerodromes) in Tunisia along with the Tunisian Government does not give proof of real neutrality."

LAWYER

M. Pflimlin is an Alsatian lawyer and has never been Prime Minister.

He tried three times in previous government crises to form a government, but each time gave up. In the summer of last year, after the fall of the Mollet Government, he spent two weeks trying to form a cabinet.—Reuter.

CURRENT & COMING
by
ANTHONY FULLER

FOR real Cinema criticism, "I Accuse," now on show at the Hoover and Liberty, emerges as the finest piece of cinema I have run up against since doing this column.

My reasons for saying this are first, the whole of the true tragic cast of Captain Alfred Dreyfus is seen as a drama, which it was. In a cinema sense, there is no hushed-up play or TV script shaped and formed into something to show on the screen, but real drama seen through the eyes of the camera.

Next, you have only to look at the cast to know before you buy your ticket that you are going to see some outstanding performances, and you will.

Then the camera work is superb, and in the wide shots of sky and landscape, the lenses have caught the panoramas of fast machines against the fleecy clouded skies of England.

Not terribly essential to the film is Helen Cherry on Miland, flanced the women who will be the stars of future monograms.

Of the smaller parts, I thoroughly enjoyed Bernard Lee as Flight Sergeant Harris, in charge of the intake you follow through their training.

He is typical of the kind who have a thousand stock gags they spread over the course, and then begin again with the next intake.

Made in CinemaScope as Technicolour, "High Flight" is a very good film; I did enjoy it, and I am quite certain you will do so.

GEAT EXPECTATIONS" the British film that helped put British films on the map is showing at the Queen's. This new print of the old masterpiece shows that even with new techniques, the skill of the great producer is the most important factor in film making.

The use of half lights to create the frightening encounter with the devilish, the joyful uncanny episode, the cherished wedding-breakfast, the grim camera studies of old London and its deportees, make great film stuff.

Most of you will have seen the film, but it is obviously a film that is going to be recalled time and again, and in my opinion, "Great Expectations" is one of the few films that has re-captured the atmosphere of a

I might as well confess that I have

on show at the King's and Princess, as the best film of its type. The question could be asked, what is its type? Well, the type is, modern jet flying and the kind of men, who handle the modern machine.

But if it were that alone, I should see no reason for

praising this film, or recommending it as good entertainment.

For quite a long time, I have mentioned "High Flight" now on show at the King's and

Princess, as the best film of its type. The question could be asked, what is its type? Well, the type is, modern jet flying and the kind of men, who handle the modern machine.

But if it were that alone, I should see no reason for

praising this film, or recommending it as good entertainment.

What this film sets out to do is to present today's Royal Air Force, and to show you an intake of young cadets, and allow you to follow them through their training. The only thing lacking is a war where the director gives you one of these many present day incidents, and as I have said in my 'box' announcing this film, you get an thrilling climax as you'll find in a film of this type.

But counter to all this thrill stuff is a clever psychological study of an angry young man, and this time he has something to be angry about, or he thinks he has.

Kenneth Haig, who was the angry young man in "Look Back in Anger," contributes a very dramatic portrayal as a rebellious young cadet who imagines he is being picked upon.

Ray Milland, as the Company Commander who has been ordered to take and hold a desert stronghold as his share in the general Allied attack against Tunis.

Having had a rough time, the Company naturally expects to be relieved, but is ordered to attack instead. This is done with all the usual British grumbling about the situation in general, and this particular objective in particular.

There are many incidents, amusing, thrilling, and at times quite fantastic, but they are better left to you to discover, as getting them out here would rob them of their surprise.

The reason for the success of "High Flight" is its excellent production and direction. The RAF co-operate fully to the point that an Officer Cadet Training Unit is as authentic as it is possible to be.

Then the camera work is superb, and in the wide shots of sky and landscape, the lenses have caught the panoramas of fast machines against the fleecy clouded skies of England.

Not terribly essential to the film is Helen Cherry on Miland, flanced the women who will be the stars of future monograms.

Made in CinemaScope as

Technicolour, "High Flight" is a very good film; I did enjoy it, and I am quite certain you will do so.

As war films go, and there is not only the frustrating labour quite a spate of them at the moment, this is quite good of the kind. Made without the flying flags, the bugle calls, the clash of the symbols and all the stuff that turns downness and integrity into a mushy turn.

This unheralded little film is a very good example of what can be done with war subject material.

Authentic, well cast, types and good, an opportunity of seeing a real episode of war, for those who like to know what it was like during the desert campaign.

First there is Richard Todd as the young Irishman who arrives as the film opens on his way to a tobacco farm. Lots of critics did not like Richard Todd's portrayal of an Irishman, but I did.

For once we got something like an Irishman, someone not liking about the "small folk" and swinging at the "creature" all the time. This time we get an Irishman for what he is; unsentimental, hardened, extremely practical, and as dour as they come.

Juliette Greco shows she is a star, after making a rather feeble start in "The Sun Also Rises," but the role of sentimental mistress fits on me a bit.

I liked Finlay Currie as the misionary, Father Verity; I thought in this bit of casting,

the producer had got his background right. It is a well balanced film, one that is hard to compare, for it is very much to its own on its own.

The situations are different the lie up is all the rotting

there is very real and often should have been made in colour.

A tremendous amount of business is poured into this film,

STAR & METROPOLIS

STEEL BAYONET! Based on an incident of the Tunisian Campaign of a company that had to hold an outpost against the Africa Korps' counter-attack. Told with British understatement; vivid incidents; film scores because it does not exploit the romantic angle of war.

Leo Genn, Kieron Moore, Michael Medwin, and Robert Brown.

LEE & ASTOR: "Men and Women." German film made in Big screen and Afsacolour. Decadent romantic type of film, cleverly exploited by rupper production. Lust in the dust; femme fatale in the salt; in tradition of the realistic European films. Isabelle Corey, Marcello Mastroianni, Lester Nafield, and Peter Cushing.

HOOVER & LIBERTY: "I Accuse." The film of the Dreyfus scandal. A perfect piece of cinema. As a film, it proves what many have suspected for a long time, that Jose Ferrer is the most important person in the cinema world at the moment. Cast: Alfred Dreyfus, Jose Ferrer, Major Estefany, Anton Walbrook, Lucie Dreyfus, Vivica Lindstrom; Major Pleurat, Leo Genn; Edmee Zola, Evelyn Williams; and many others.

ROXY & BROADWAY: "Naked Earth." Impressive photography, good script, well balanced plot, exciting incidents, good studies from Juliette Greco, Richard Todd, Finlay Currie, and Laurence Naismith. A different kind of film with a different treatment, and a new way of handling wild country material.

COMING

QUEEN'S: Continuing Film Festival series with new Continental films and re-playing film classics.

KING'S & PRINCESS: "Bonjour Tristesse." Top class Otto Preminger production. A sophisticated decadent journey where rich people bemoan about wasted yesterdays and uncertain tomorrows. Cynical, bitter sweet atmosphere, exaggerated anecdotes, faded photographs. A very attractive cast including morose part for Jean Seberg; debonair David Niven; super Deborah Kerr; and Geoffrey Horne, and Mylene Demongeot. Juliette Greco is there to sing the title song.

ROXY & BROADWAY: "The Young Lions." A film that is much more than a film.

The whole business of man's inability to deal with his own problems of racial hatred and tribal jealousies, and his self-destruction is put on the screen. Great performance from Marion Brando, Montgomery Clift.

A truly great picture.

Dodds-Parker, Fletcher-Cooke, Cooper-Key, Gomme-Duncan, Mott-Radcliffe, MacCarthy-Willis-Bund, Garner Evans...so the double-barrelled list grows

What Makes A Man Take The Hyphen?

London. THE man with a hyphen is a peculiarly British figure. No other nation sets quite so much store by his small mark—which makes a man's name double-barrelled.

Dodds-Parker, Fletcher-Cooke, Crosthwaite-Eyre and Cooper-Key: the roll of members of Parliament echoes with such sonorous and imposing names. More than 40 MPs now boast a hyphen. All but three of them are Tories. Only the Nelson-Bakers, father and son, and Sir Lynn Ungoed-Thomas shake out a Socialist claim to hyphenated status.

Inherited

Many MPs inherited their hyphens. But six or seven of them have acquired them during their lifetime. Sir Alan Gomme-Gomme-Duncan was once plain Mr Duncan; Sir Charles Mott-Radcliffe lived out his early years as Mr Radcliffe. It seems to be the fashion nowadays to attach the hyphen at the front of the old surname. It was not always so. The Liberal Prime Minister, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman was Mr Campbell, not Mr Bannerman, when he first entered the Commons; while Sir Arthur Steel-Maitland, the Tory Minister of Labour, was Master Steel at birth, not Master Maitland. Some men exchange one hyphen for another. The most notable example of the transferred hyphen in our day is that of Lord Swinton. As Sir Philip Lloyd-Greame he had won a reputation as a member of the House of Commons and was President of the Board of Trade under Bonar Law and Baldwin. But after his wife succeeded to the Swinton estate at Masham, Sir Philip took her maiden name as his own and resumed his political career as Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister. Not since Mr Ashmead-Burke became Mr Burdett has there been a man marrying the former Victorian breeches had such a radical change of name overtaken an MP.

Motives

The occasions which give birth to a hyphen are many and various. Often a hyphen is a condition of succeeding to property; sometimes a desire to perpetuate a dying name; occasionally an urge to make a common surname less common. Some men take their wife's name. Thus Mr Ivor Thomas, the former Socialist MP who became a Tory, took the name of Bulmer-Thomson after marrying into the Herefordshire elder family. Other men turn to mother for their inspiration. So the son of Professor George formed himself into the Rev. F. L. MacCarthy-Willis-Bund. Even in the Church hyphens tempt.

They can give rise to misunderstanding and dispute. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Heathcoat Amory, objected to the insertion of a hyphen between his names when he was at the Board of Trade. But his brother, Sir John Heathcoat-Amory, Bl. insists on his hyphen. And Mr Heathcoat-Amory is his heir.

Corrected

On the other hand, Mr Patrick Gordon Walker, the Socialist ex-Minister, announced some years ago that he was thinking of taking a hyphen:

His reason? He was tired of being credited with one in error. David Lloyd George in his early days in public life was known as Mr George. But even when the Lloyd came into most inevitable use, he found it unnecessary to reach for a hyphen. Not so his son Gwynlyn. Before he became Lord Tenby he quietly instructed the House of Commons authorities to give him a hyphen.

Mr James Henderson Stewart, too, when he was made a baronet last year decided he could do with a hyphen and asked the authorities to slip one into place. So the numbers spread.

Speculation

Current speculation surrounds the person of Mr Emyln Garner Evans. He has fought elections as a Liberal. He has stood and sat as a Tory. But always he has been plain Mr Evans. Never again, if Monsard is anything to go by, next time he approaches the electorate it will be as Mr Emyln Garner-Evans. Truly great men do not need this support.

Sir Winston Churchill's full name is Spencer-Churchill. But he has got on all right without the hyphen all these years. That pillar of propriety, the Commonwealth, insisted on Sir Winston's hyphen right up to the end of November 1951. But on December 5 of that year it, too, succumbed to prevailing usage, and for first time let slip the universally loved name of Churchill. —(London Express Service).

Goldfish Led Owner To Court

Birmingham. THERE was Derrick Strahan, driving his goldfish to school....

As they drew near the school for spastic children where Strahan's wife teaches, and where he was going to show the children the goldfish, Derrick pulled up sharply at an intersection.

A basket containing a bowl, water and the goldfish fell off the front seat, and the goldfish slumped around on the floor.

Slipped Off

Strahan bent down to rescue the fish and its bowl. His foot slipped off the brake and the car rolled on—into another automobile that a policeman was parking.

The policeman, described in court as "decent and humane," first attended to the unhappy goldfish. He got water for the goldfish.

Then he charged Strahan with carelessness. Strahan was fined £2.—United Press.

Up In Arms Over Pirate Barbers

Edinburgh.

BRITAIN'S barbers declared verbal war on 1,000 pairs of pirate scissors threatening their bread and butter.

The National Hairdressers Federation adopted a resolution hero demanding that steps be taken to stop hairdressing in factories and especially nationalised industries.

The federation said there were at least 1,000 free-lancing part-time barbers in the country who administer haircuts in public factories and private homes.

Federation President H. A. Prosser said, "These are black workers. They pay no income tax for what they earn. They are robbing the country." United Press.

Hertford.

A local brewery acknowledged payment of a 67-year-old bill for 18 shillings, covering 18 gallons of beer sold to a man when beer cost one shilling a gallon. A relative of the man who died several years ago said the bill was unpaid so long because he moved from the district.—United Press.

The Major And The Mums

London.

FOR all mothers with sons in the Army, there comes today quite a shock.

Because mothers, it seems, are a bad influence on soldiers.

This somewhat astonishing statement is contained in an attack on the British soldier in a semi-official magazine called The Army Quarterly.

Granted, it is no serving officer who makes the charge. The author is a retired major, Reginald Hargreaves, author and military historian.

But since this magazine circulates among the top officers it is not without influence.

Major Hargreaves calls the modern soldier petulant, irresponsible, lacking in morale, and resentful of discipline.

Firmly, he blames the mothers' "petrific influence."

Pride...

HIS accusation: "The anaconda-like embrace in which the mother enfolds her boy is such that he enters the Service psychologically preconditioned suddenly to resent his severance from the encirclement home influence; to which his deplorable lack of moral fibre can be attributed."

In a grandiloquent style of writing, the major harps back to the good old days when wives and mothers wept with pride as they said goodbye to soldiers.

"Even so recently as 1914 the mother might shed a silent tear," he writes, "but she would still join in the chorus of 'We don't want to lose you, but we know you ought to go.'"

Yet according to the major, the "First World War 'Mums'" have not pulled their weight or brought up children suitable for joining the Army's

They'd Never Seen Anything Like It

London.

A US serviceman made satirically conservative Britons grope in open-mouthed astonishment at a West End underground station the other night.

He wore black shoes with white socks, black shirt with white tie, white suit with a one inch black stripe down the pants seam and a white overcoat.

The American refused to give his name or his base in Britain but confirmed he was a "Yank."

A cinema outside the entrance to the underground station is showing the film "The Quiet American." —United Press.

LOCH NESS MONSTER DEFENDED

Edinburgh.

A FRIEND of the "Loch Ness Monster" brought an angry pen to bear on its behalf.

"I speak for the whole of the Highlands if not whole of Scotland in resentment against the hunting of the Loch Ness monster," Wendy Wood of Edinburgh wrote to the Scots Bulletin here.

"If Mum's boy should be found wanting in these sterling qualities and proves incapable of their steady cultivation, then the blame must very largely rest on 'MUM.'

The major forgets that throughout many centuries, whether a soldier was in bivouac, in a foxhole, or in muddy, shell-torn trenches, the one thing that sustains him more than anything else is the warm thought of home and MUM."

—Hugh POND

IN-LAWS KIDNAPPED HIS BRIDE!

Naples.
So you think you have mother-in-law troubles?

Antonio Romano's mother-in-law led a strong arm squad of six other in-laws to kidnap Antonio's bride during the couple's honeymoon.

Romano, a tailor, told police his bride, Giuseppina, was whisked away by the in-laws because he refused to take his wife back to live with them.

Giuseppina and Romano were honeymooning in the nearby town of Paternopoli when the in-laws paid them a visit, begging Antonio to take his bride back to live at their home in Saviano.

The groom refused, arguing he had a good job as a tailor in Naples and he did not want to live with his in-laws anyway.

Giuseppina's parents left in a huff. The next day they returned with reinforcements—the bride's grandfather and four uncles.

The in-laws assault force dragged Giuseppina from Antonio's arms, fighting off the rescue.

Now Antonio lodged kidnapping charges against the in-laws, who were believed holding Giuseppina back home in Saviano. —United Press.

The Zeppelins May Rule The Skies Again

Frankfurt. THE world commercial airlines may soon face tough West German competition if plans to build a giant airship are realised.

The man who piloted the Graf Zeppelin and Hindenburg airships, Max Pruss, 66, said blueprints have been drawn up for a new airship capable of carrying 200 passengers, 70 tons of freight, and capable of cruising across the Atlantic at 100 mph.

The new Zeppelin will only need to fill 30 per cent of its passenger and freight space to realize a good profit, Pruss said. Commenting on recent air mishaps, Pruss said crash possibilities in the new airship will be practically negligible because it will be filled with helium.

"The Hindenburg was filled with hydrogen, one of the most inflammable gases," Pruss said. The airship expert was piloting the mighty Hindenburg when it exploded on landing at Lakehurst, N.J., on May 6, 1937. Thirty-five of the 97 passengers and crew were killed.

PIDGIN LANGUAGES

by Robert Wallace Thompson

THE beginnings of pidgin English by people belonging to certain occupations in Hongkong are obvious. They may be seen when the Parisian agent de police speaks to the Englishman in the infinitive, "prendre metro et descendre station..." They were seen when European overseers gave their first orders to Africans of many tribal origins in the plantations of the New World in the 17th and 18th centuries and when the raw slaves tried to speak to their masters or to each other.

They were seen when the "Bounty" mutineers got acquainted with their Polynesian wives on Pitcairn and when the blackbirders roamed Melanesia in search of hardy labour for North Queensland. The pidgin dialects of the China coast arose in much the same way and were encouraged by the Imperial decrees which forbade the teaching of the Celestial language to the outer barbarians. It seems that many Chinese officials delighted in using what to them was a mangled form of the foreign devil's speech.

The Start

A general process which can be postulated for the genesis of all pidgin dialects is the deliberate simplification of a language, generally that of a trader, in whose slave-owner. In order to simplify, speakers tend to cast aside all but the most essential inflections; tenses, if its language has them often go, "I see him yesterday, I see him today, I see him tomorrow," make quite a lot of sense. In "simplifying" most speakers tend to use the language one employs when talking to a small child. Hence the superficial similarity of pidgin speech to baby-talk.

The person to whom the simplified language is addressed learns quickly and may well add, often quite unintentionally, features from his own native speech to it. So in certain West African Pidgins and in many dialects spoken south of the Mason-Dixon line a B-bound replaces a V sound as in the not too authentic "Way down upon a sunshiny Ribbal," "fly like" for fried rice in Anglo-Chinese is a good example and so is the English soldier's "Sandy Fatty" or "Any" for "Ca no salt rien" or "Beau Jeu" for "Bonjour" where rice... however, English sounds are substituted for the outlandish French nasal.

The learner's speech habits are not confined to sounds but include syntax and some of this too is carried over into the new type of language. Think of Anglo-Irish "through her, we're after speaking him; he's here in the morning"; where the Gaels in Scotland streaks out a mile. So in China Coast Pidgin the Chinese dialects are still represented by the numeral suffix-pidgin as in waitpid man, a man, waitpid till, a tree.

The expression has got, there is, there are, is more complicated since, although it is a perfect translation of the Cantonese (and general Chinese) phrase, it may be reinforced by the Macanese and Pidgin Portuguese "ten" which means either "have/or" there is;" there are." This construction is incidentally common to the standard Romance languages and is frequent in the creole dialects of the West Indies. A Trinidadian, speaking of a local dance, once said to me "It had a lot of pretty girls there last night."

The Creol

Once the processes we have described have taken place between a large number of individuals, perhaps for years, the new contact vernacular that is so formed takes on a relatively stable vocabulary, structure and pronunciation, all consistent enough to "make communication possible. Such a language may be "no one's native language. Yet it may be widely learnt and used, for dealings between peoples of widely different speech.

Such is Neo-Melanesian, which has taken such a foothold as the lingua franca of New Guinea and the Solomons Islands. Such was China Coast Pidgin in the days of the Canton factories and the Treaty Ports, when Chinese and Europeans traded and even when Chinese from different regions conversed together. The very word pidgin is said to be early pidginisation of English "business." Though China Coast Pidgin has lost some of its vigour through lack of use by educated Chinese and by the disappearance of the conditions which once prevailed in its former strongholds, I believe that it is still widely learnt as a short-cut to

FROM RAGS TO RICHES:

She Spent £6 Million In A Few Years— Yet She Begged On The Streets As A Child

By JOHN COTTRELL

BEAUTY and charm were the only assets of Jeanne Bécu, daughter of a humble French seamstress. She grew up in the lowliest of circumstances. As a child she had to beg on the streets for bread.

But those two assets were quite sufficient to take her from rags to riches. They captured the eye of a middle-aged hanger-on at the French Court of a King. They brought her the title of Comtesse and made her the richest, most celebrated woman in all France.

Jeanne Bécu became one of the outstanding figures of 18th century French history. But she is remembered by a different name—as the fabulous Madame du Barry, last of the left-hand queens of France."

What was the secret of her extraordinary success? How could a woman of such humble origin win—and keep—a position so close to King Louis XV?

It was Jeanne's beauty which first attracted the attention of Louis and he soon became completely infatuated with her. But there were plenty of women just as beautiful in France and they were all at his disposal.

What really kept Jeanne Bécu in his favour until the day he died was her very special brand of charm. He loved her for her good-naturedness and, most of all, for her unusual frankness.

She genuinely wanted to please the King. But unlike the other courtiers who surrounded Louis XV she did not cringe and fawn for the King's favour. And unlike so many royal mistresses before her, she had no wish to meddle in important political affairs.

Jeanne was essentially feminine, a gay exuberant woman, who loved to have beautiful things. To the King, she was more than a mistress. She was the perfect companion, and he was happy to keep her—whatever the cost.

Illegitimate child

"La belle du Barry," as she came to be called, was born in 1743. She had no legal father, and for some years her mother had a bitter struggle to keep herself and her daughter from starving.

For a while Jeanne lived and was educated in a convent. Then her mother married and her step-father sent her out on the streets to help stave off the family exigencies. Thus, very early in life, she learned how to wheedle gifts from men.

At the age of 18, she became an apprentice in a men's hatters. Most of the customers showed more interest in Jeanne than in the hats.

Men were fascinated by the pretty creature with blue eyes and corn-coloured hair. As the fame of her beauty spread, the hatter was gratified to find his trade improving rapidly.

A year later, when Jeanne left him to work in a gaming house, many of his customers disappeared as well.

It was at the gaming house, where she worked as an actress, that she first heard of Orders of the King. She was the one woman who made him really happy.

The King never tired of her as did his other mistresses. With her light hearted, witty manner, she kept him constantly amused and lifted him out of the dark mood to which he was susceptible.

The thief, she was told, had escaped to England. So Madame du Barry set off after him and gave her enemies the chance of branding her as an escaping aristocrat.

She made four visits to London. On returning from the last of them in 1783, the Revolutionaries accused her of working with anti-Revolutionary agents and, though she was innocent, she was arrested and tried.

Although she was witty, Jeanne never spoke maliciously of anyone, whatever others might say about her. Her hard and humble upbringing had taught her that it never pays to make an enemy—especially an enemy in high places.

This young girl who had never known luxury, spent lavishly but tastefully. She bought paintings by Rembrandt and Van Dyke, and surrounded herself with beautiful things.

Jewelled clocks, magnificent clothes, and the finest porcelain in Europe were delivered to her in Versailles and the chateau at Luciennes which Louis had given her.

Within a few years her expenditure reached the staggering total of £0,000,000. She had estates, pensions and Crown properties showered upon her by the King.

At the same time, Jeanne did not neglect her family. She established her mother in comfort for the rest of her life and provided handsomely for relatives.

As for du Barry, "The Reine," she reaped a handsome profit from his shrewd investment, gaining much power and wealth. But in the end his desire to be too great, and he was ordered to retire to his estates.

In that rattling cart, she was trundled over the same cobblestones she had once covered in a golden coach seated beside the King of France.

Her cries were in vain. She was pushed, stumbling, through the mud and on to the block. For a moment she struggled with the executioner and his assistants. Then the shining blade of the guillotine flashed down and the crowd cheered.

Thus ended, abruptly, the life of a woman who had known extreme poverty, fantastic wealth, and, at the last, stark terror.

She settled in her Chateau at Luciennes.

There, for many years, she lived in fine style, attended by an immense staff. She entertained extravagantly, but also used her money to help the poor.

Then, in 1789, came the Revolution.

In those days of terror, Jeanne du Barry behaved in an indecent and foolish fashion. She could now ride in royal carriages, mix with members of the Royal Family, and attend important Court ceremonies.

Louis XV could not give enough to Jeanne du Barry. His household had to take such impudent liberties with his money.

She continued to subscribe to florist papers, and when a large quantity of her jewellery was stolen, drew attention to

Life with Rex

NOW FOR THE FIRST TIME

Kay Kendall talks of her marriage, movies, and her Man

by DAVID LEWIN

KAY KENDALL had been out house-hunting. "I'm looking for a home," she said. "Something for Rex and a garden for the two dogs. We'll be here for a year, and you can't live in an hotel for all that time, can you?"

She was gay and vivid, in a Paris model coat with silk lining which people insist on thinking came from London and not from Balmain. She was wearing a woollen sack dress with just a medium skirt length.

Miss Kay Kendall is back in London for the first time in more than two years, and also for the first time as the wife of Rex Harrison.

She was, she said, a changed girl. "Being married to Rex has given me security. I've got some roots now. I belong. My children used to talk about me as old scatty Katie before, and I always lived like a champagne bottle."

"I'd just got a career and very little else. No home—sometimes a flat, sometimes digs, sometimes an hotel room."

"I'm 30 now and I have been working—more or less since I was 11."

"I went into the ballet in 'Wild Violets' when I was 11, and I followed that with 'Black Velvet'."

On tour

AT 17 they made me a star in 'London Town' and at 17 too I had ulcers with worry. At 19 I was out of work and 'London Town' was such a disaster I left the country for two years and went around with touring repertory companies in Germany and Italy learning to act.

"And I picked up some pretty bad acting habits then too. I used to say all my lines to the people in the front row. Anyone further back than that didn't hear a thing."

me to do a film," she said. "But I'm not keen."

"Look at it this way: for a film I'd have to get up at six in the morning and I'd be back home from the studios at seven in the evening. At seven in the evening Rex would be at the theatre and by the time he was through by eleven I'd have to be in bed to get up again by six the following morning."

"That is not a satisfactory married life."

Support

WHAT I'd really like to do is a play then Rex and I would have every day together. I'm reading scripts like mad now—but everything I have been offered is a star part."

"But I have never starred in anything in the West End—not on stage and I don't think I should start off as the main lead. What I want is a nice supporting role where I get killed off something after the test of it."

This was the new and mature Kay Kendall speaking. The Kay Kendall who, after scoring a film triumph in "Les Girls" with Gene Kelly and collecting awards and offers by the dozen, turned her back on Hollywood and returned to being Mrs. Rex Harrison, housewife, on Long Island, New York.

She gathered up her coat—the Paris model coat—and went out into the street to keep another house-hunting appointment.

"And I decided that nothing in work was really worth getting ulcers over and what I wanted most was a home and security and my career could come after that."

"And that is the way it is now."

In London for the next year Mr. Harrison will be working. And his wife? "Well, they want

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET CASE BROUGHT FORTH A LISTENING CLUSTER OF LEGAL FIGURES . . .

WAS LORD KYLSANT GUILTY?

IF you were writing a novel about a man endowed with glamour—that magical fascination which defies analysis—what would you make him by profession so that his daily work contributed some little extra glamour of its own?

A surgeon, may be. Or a top-rank politician. Or a popular advocate. Or a racing motorist. Or even—if you have never encountered one—an actor.

But an accountant? No. Accountants demands great skill, and in this modern age often confer great power. Glamour, however, is not within its ambit. And accountants themselves—except, of course, for you sir, and that very special exception—madam, whom you know so well—do not as a rule possess the type of personality that makes every heart beat faster by its presence.

One associates The Accountant, not with glamour, but with diligence and worth.

Mr. Harold Morland, one of Britain's most respected and ablest accountants during the period between the two world wars might well have stood as his profession's prototype. He was quietly efficient, undemonstratively solid, perhaps a trifle fussy correct. He represented perfectly—though at the top most level—that vast army of anonymous accountants which pours into the City at nine o'clock each morning, adds up and subtracts, and at five o'clock departs.

GLAMOUR RATING

And yet Mr. Morland's trial in 1951 for aiding and abetting the publication of false company reports—surpassed in glamour any other ever held at the Old Bailey, whether one looks to the background to the Bar or to the dock.

The dock. Side by side with self-contained and modest Mr. Morland sat a more striking and masculine figure—Baron Kyllant, Lord Lieutenant of Carmarthen, former MP for Chester, and a pillar of British commercial life for more than 30 years.

The Bar? A glittering cluster of formal glory included, with one solitary absentee, all the most fashionable leaders of the day: Sir John Simon, Sir Patrick Hastings and Sir William Jowitt rubbed shoulders with Mr. Pritt and Mr. Stuart Bevan in the nine-day marathon of evidence and argument.

And the background? In the background lay that national institution of 1929: the personally initiated upon introducing the words "Adjustment of taxation reserves" in describing the company's balance for that year. But the Crown, so far from accepting this phrase as exoneration, are turning it into the very spearhead of their case against him. Had it been "Taken from reserves" or "Transferred from reserves" they might have looked on Mr. Morland with a more benevolent eye. But "Adjustment of taxation reserves"—it was deliberately chosen, Mr. Attorney claims, because it would convey nothing to an ordinary person, but would furnish some sort of cover if necessity arose. "It betrays an unenvy conscientious and guilty mind."

VITAL QUESTION

The fate of Mr. Morland—reputationally ill-favoured even—thus hangs upon the jury's answer to a single question: Did he employ that form of words with intention to deceive? And the jury's answer in its turn will largely hinge upon the exchanges that are just beginning between Sir Patrick Hastings—Morland's counsel—and Lord Plender.

"Have you known Mr. Morland many years?"

"I have," Lord Plender says. "And had close contacts with him?"

"Do you know any member of your profession?" Hastings asks. "Who enjoys a higher reputation for integrity?"

"No," Lord Plender says without hesitation. "I do not."

The reciprocal query does not miss—on the contrary, it often marks reciprocal hostility. This is a cross-examination with a difference: cross-examination minus its traditional characteristics. No attack looms upon the witness's evidence; that would be pointless, as his evidence is formal. No attack looms upon the witness's credit; that would be not only pointless but virtually impossible—Lord Plender is the acknowledged doyen of accountants.

The beckoning prize for Hastings—if only he can get it—is Lord Plender's endorsement of Mr. Morland's conduct. "Lord Plender, I would like to ask some questions about what the Attorney-General has referred to as 'secret reserves.' I would like to refer to them," Hastings casually adds, "as 'inner reserves.'

"Why?" the Judge interpolates.

"Because it sounds rather better," Hastings replies, with discerning frankness. "But whatever we call them, Lord Plender, it is a practice, is it not, of many large commercial enterprises to have secret inner or internal reserves?"

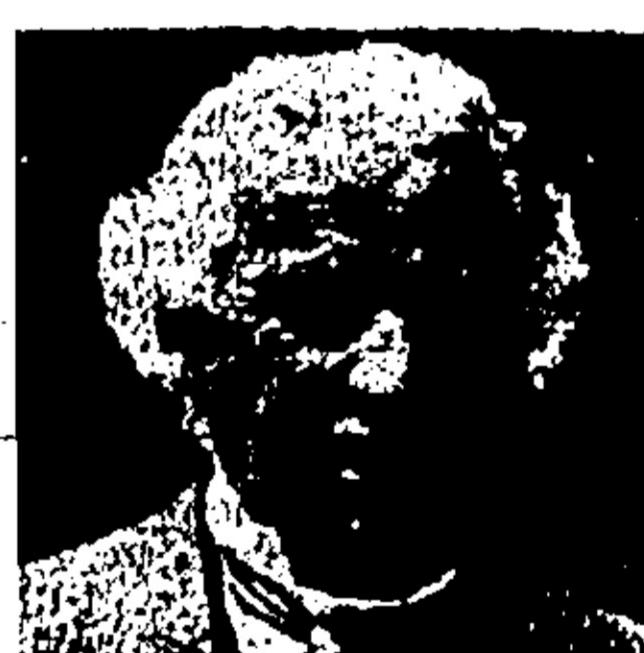

"Yes."

"And to set aside sums to such reserves out of an unusually prosperous year or years?"

"Yes."

Expert under fire—

by EDGAR LUSTGARTEN

HAROLD MORLAND
Fate hung on a single question.

might there come a time when the auditor would say that if the reserves are to be used again, some indication must be given?"

"Yes," Lord Plender says.

"Are there certain phrases commonly used by auditors as an indication?"

"Yes."

"Is one of them 'Adjustment of taxation reserves'?"

"Yes."

Step by tiny step the advance continues.

"That expression indicates from reserves?"

"Yes."

"Those transfers might be either large or small?"

"Yes."

SIGH OF RELIEF

Hastings can now compress the whole of Mr. Morland's case into a single question—with complete assurance of a favourable answer.

"If you saw such words in a profit and loss account, would you understand from that that there had been a transfer, which might be small or large, from excess profits duty or other reserves?"

Lord Plender gives his verdict.

"Certainly," he says...

Certainly. It was the appropriate word. Mr. Morland's defenders heaved a huge sigh of relief. Only a jury perverse beyond normal calculation could, upon an issue as highly technical, run counter to the clearly expressed judgment of one so knowledgeable—and so conscientious.

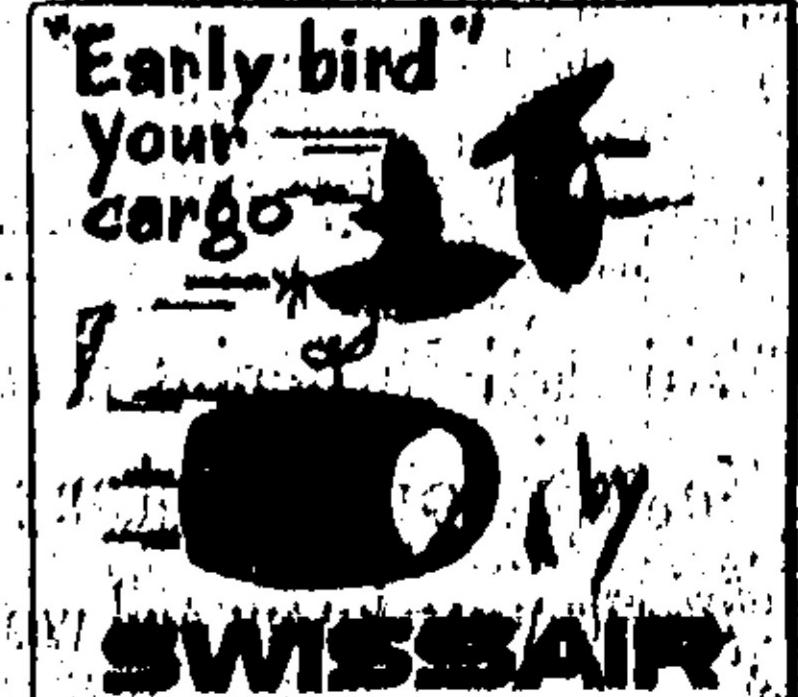

PANIC VICTIMS

Mr. Morland was acquitted. In my opinion, he should not have been charged. Lord Kyllant on a separate accusation (that of publishing a fraudulent prospectus) received a sentence of 12 months' imprisonment. In my opinion, he should not have been convicted.

I hold both men victims, in differing degree, of a national near-panic following on the Harry slump of 1929.

INTERVIEWING THE
OFF-CENTRE PEOPLE

Mr. "Here-to-Eternity"

GIVING
(IN DRESSING-GOWN)
HIS MILLION-DOLLAR
FORMULA

ALTHOUGH I am just a poor relation, it is very nice to claim some kinship with the men who have managed to make money out of letters. And I am not referring to blackmail.

Because—better than some moneyed individual prepared to pay for his indiscretions—there is today a whole industry held to ransom for words.

Write a book... write a play... write good dialogue... write situations... write a bold, bold plot... write nothing but a fragment—an idea in embryo. (But preferably write a panorama.) And the men who make million-dollar movies will make you a dollar millionaire.

I have struck this materialistic mood after meeting Master James Jones, a name you will probably not remember, but whose book "From Here to Eternity" no doubt will. (Others may simply recall the film-of-the-book or the book-of-the-film, depending on the way you glean your higher education.)

"Gee, I'm sorry about this," he said heavily. "But I guess I'll be confined to my room for a couple of days. It's funny, but I'm never sick at home."

He interrupted my glance. "Well, I read somewhere that gin and bitters is good for the stomach."

Mrs. Jones, wearing grey pearls, and dark glasses, threw me a narrow look and a wide smile.

"Jim wants to do a novel with a Paris background," she said.

"Gloria! I have two novels planned with European backgrounds," said Mr. Jones, a trifle testy. "One from France and one from Italy." To me, "I've been mauling notes to them for a number of years, and now seem as good as ever as any to roll up and come over."

I asked Mr. Jones if he planned all his novels in advance.

"However," she said in the best lit-blitz tradition, "the interview must go on."

We discovered Mr. Jones sprawled on his bed, a mile wan and naked (I assume) but for the aforementioned red foulard.

again. So I guess I'm not making much headway."

While not making headway with his overall plan, Mr. Jones is still not wasting time.

The 700 pages of "Eternity" brought him around £350,000 from its 4,000,000 sales and the 1,200-page second "Carrie" has been sold to the movies for a quarter-million dollars plus a percentage of the gross.

"Course it took me four years to do the first and nearly seven to do the second," added Mr. Jones. "But I visualise my novels covering the social structure of America from the 'twenties to the present day."

"Well, I began with 11 planned," he said. "I wrote two—'From Here to Eternity' and 'Some Came Running'—but since then I got three new ideas which brings me back to 11."

"From Here to Eternity" and "Some Came Running"—but since then I got three new ideas which brings me back to 11."

The telephone rang, and Mr. Jones took time out to tell the B.B.C. that he felt as much like facing the TV cameras as he did food.

Mr. Jones poured some coffee and said life for the past few weeks had been just a series of partiles to say "Good-bye" and partiles to say "Hello," and even she was feeling a bit nauseous and no wonder.

I, meanwhile, was wondering why the European novel, as epitomised by Miss Sagan's 100-page volumes, was getting shiner than its American equivalent, got fatter.

Maybe it all reflects Europe's deliberate unshouldering of responsibility on to the United States since the war, but then Miss Sagan should worry, have

No, We AREN'T The Only Country That Can't Make A Railway Pay!

By JOHN WATERMAN

Germany:

BRITAIN is not the only country faced with trouble on the railways—not the only country that cannot make its railways pay. In an uneasy world there is one point of wide international agreement: running a railway without trouble and with profit is a tough business.

Canada:

IN Canada a strike looms up for the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railways. A Royal Commission set up following a previous strike has found that firemen serve no useful purpose on diesel locomotives working in CPR freight yards. CPR intend to cut the number of such firemen from May 11. The men's union vigorously opposes the decision—and a strike appears inevitable.

Coming now, this would be a particularly bitter blow to CPR. In 1958 their railway earnings were a record. But last year the company suffered a sharp drop in income because of the slowdown in Canadian economic expansion. Ten per cent less freight was moved than in the previous year. Net railway earnings fell by more than £1,000,000 to about £13 million. Dividends were clippings.

The state-owned Canadian National Railways had, if anything, worse time. Much of their income is swallowed by fixed charges on stock of the companies that were nationalised.

Even before 1957 ended, a deficit of up to £2,000,000 for the year was forecast. The final figure has not yet been made public, but it may well represent an even greater loss than this. And the Canadian taxpayer will foot the bill.

To complete the homely familiar look of these Canadian railways both companies recently applied to increase their freight charges ten per cent and, both face, new wage demands.

Rail wages, too, are among the highest in the world. An engine-driver first-class earns £60-£102 a month plus £170 a year mileage bonus. If he lives in a principal town he gets another £2 a year. If married he gets another £42 a year plus £25 a year for each child.

A signalman earns from £44 to £71 a month with the same family allowances as drivers, wage peaks.

plus another £25 a year for total nightwork.

A guard-ticket-collector on trains earns roughly £16-£20 a week with the same family allowances.

Compare the price of a ticket from Victoria to Brighton. It is 12s. 9d. first, and 9s. 6d. second class.

Presumably if Sir Brian Robertson jacked up the charges Swiss heights even British Railways could be made to pay—and the railmen would not be threatening a strike again.

Yet there is a snag to this story of the splendid Alpine wage peaks.

Cost of travel is exceedingly high. A 50-mile journey costs 10s. 8d. first class and 14s. 6d. second class.

Compare the price of a ticket from Victoria to Brighton. It is 12s. 9d. first, and 9s. 6d. second class.

AS THE CONSPIRATORS PLAN THEIR NEXT GRAB, THE WEST MUST FACE A THREAT TO ITS FUTURE

GAMAL Abdel Nasser in Moscow! This, for Krushchev, is the real foreign conference of the year — a conference not of statesmen but of revolutionaries.

This conference is out to get results. It may not be the Summit. For you and me it could be far more important. Here will be forged not vague agreements about disarmament but plans for the control of Middle East oil and for the Soviet attack on Africa.

What is at stake are not abstractions but the control of the oil which is our biggest investment, and the lifeblood of our, and Europe's, economy. Our petrol, our prices, your job, your wages, could all be endangered.

This is the second round of Suez. In the first round we lost the Canal. Now the attack is to be on the oilfields.

The tide runs on

IT may be said that Russia is only using Nasser as a cat's-paw. Maybe. But does that matter to Moscow if the cat's-paw is being used successfully? No wonder then that Russia is now stalling about that other Summit conference.

The sputniks and the open letters and the barrage of Peace-and-Peace talk have hypnotised the West into peering for wonders in the sky while the ground is crumbling at their feet.

It has been a triumph for the policy of diversion.

The Soviet has been lured into chimerical debates on the exact permissible degree of Hydrogen Bomb Warfare—while outside the tide of world revolution runs on, sweeping away our redoubts, our key areas for raw materials and world communications.

While we have been speculating on the deadlock in Europe the Soviet has been taking trick after trick in the Far and Middle East.

After Suez, is a united Middle East beyond reach? Is it our allies? Must our disagreement with the Americans on Buzanini, or that of our own Foreign Office with the French over Algeria, destroy any hope of unity? Must indeed tycoons always be nagging us? Must joint initiatives always be lost?

No further

ON the contrary. If Nasser's visit to Moscow has any good side to it at all, it is that it presents the West with one simple decision of policy—which is vital that they should agree to make together. Russia must be allowed to encroach no further in the Middle East. This means that Russia's tool, Nasser, must be contained within his own boundaries economically and by the rule of international law.

Does that mean that we must be prepared to protest others against his aggression in the future? It does. For we can be certain that Nasser's trip to the Soviet.

What is Nasser up to in Moscow?

DEMACHY TAKES HIS SKETCH-BOOK TO THE RACES (in Paris)

NOT A
SIGHT!

GOING to the Races is a vastly different business in France and Britain.

In France the women take their racing seriously.

There are horses—but naturally. What matters, as ever, is the tout ensemble.

Demachy sends me a drawing from Longchamp.

On the left is a Pierre Cardin suit. In the centre a navy Patou and with white piping and Dior's trapeze line in silk tweed.

On the right—Nina Ricci's pink dress and jacket with its printed silk hat and cashmere.

See what I mean by seriously?

Now what about the woman at the races in Britain?

I went in search of her with the boss of a fashion business in Belgravia (that most sophisticated of cities) who was visiting Britain for the first time.

More than anything, he told me, he longed to see the true English Lady "Sportive". In her superb English tailoring.

Wicked woman that I am, I took him to our local point-to-point races.

I thought he'd die laughing. But the laugh was on me.

The bigger, squarer, and tweedier the women were the more he admired them.

"Look . . . see . . . oh, look . . . these wonderful women, so large, so much shapes to them—and all the way down," (seated—skirts). "Ah, beautiful-o-o-o."

"And the colours . . . what subtlety . . . these so-smart shades of earth and mud. Enchanting."

"Ah, the size of them," he sighed—"the scornful air—the mystery."

I asked what he had thought of our tailormades.

"It is the shoulders that fascinate me," he cried—squeezing himself up and making imaginary corners with his hands—"like boxes. They are unique."

"In all Belgravia is NOTHING like this." I said. I could well believe him.

What rot they talk about uniforms

AS a mother who has just sewn on 52 name tapes, soaked three large handkerchiefs with tears and delivered up one 18-year-old daughter to boarding school complete with a ton and a half of school trousseau—at least a third of which seems totally unnecessary—I have very decided views on school clothing.

I am hundred per cent in favour of uniform—provided it's CHEAP and CHEERFUL.

The leveller

I don't care if the children attend the snootiest of snooty boarding schools or one of our splendid new glass cubist primaries.

It doesn't matter if they are seven or seventeen.

Uniform is the best possible leveller.

Why?

Because GIRLS at any age are little women—vain, fashion-conscious, competitive, and often needlessly cruel to each other. Particularly in their teens.

To Blazes with "wear what you please" for sixth formers. Here's hoping that edict doesn't catch on generally.

At a time when they mind less about their looks, the blissful anonymity of a school uniform cuts out competition and gives the girls chance to concentrate on work.

As for the younger children—the little lambs love to look identical.

A friend of mine thought she had fooled her daughter with a chain-store blazer as near as dammit to her school uniform and half the price.

Oh really? the pockets were at a different angle.

"Do want you like?" said the girl with the face of an early Christian martyr about to be tested to the lions. "but I'd die rather than wear it."

See what I mean?

Now for those boarding school clothes, lads.

No one can convince me that any girl needs three uniform cotton dresses, one uniform best dress, three (personal choice) dresses, one dancing dress, a tunic and blazer, a skirt, pull-over, two cardigans, six blouses, a hooded cape, a tailored suit, and a raincoat for a 12 weeks' summer term.

"That," said the buyer in one of the largest school supply stores whom I interviewed, "is mad."

"By comparison with some others," she added hastily, seeing my face.

Reform it

What it needed is a complete reform of all uniforms.

Living within a three-mile radius of my home are girls from practically every public school in Southern England. It's Bertrand to the left of me, Rodcast to the right of me, Heathfield close behind me and Queen Anne practically treatin' on my tail.

What do they wear during the holidays?

Almost without exception it's a uniform of a very different kind—jeans, tee shirt and zip-fronted windcheater or duffle jacket.

Why not for school—every school—with the addition of a couple of flower-printed regulation "best" dresses?

It would save all mothers goodness knows how much money to spend on the kind of leisure clothes teenagers start wanting during their last years at school.

It would also halve the number of those wretched, fiddly, pestilential name tapes.

And now

SITTING in as a judge at the Conny Fashion Grand Prix Contest last week I was amused to note that rabbit stoles, wolvers to look like mink, were real mink tails.

It is only a matter of weeks since I reported on the latest in nylon, fake mink—with real tails.

Are our fakes becoming so good that minks can't look forward to a ripe old age—secure in the knowledge that they have nothing to lose—apart, of course, from those tails?

Madness

Why not for school—every school—with the addition of a couple of flower-printed regulation "best" dresses?

It would save all mothers goodness knows how much money to spend on the kind of leisure clothes teenagers start wanting during their last years at school.

It's a matter of pride or something.

"Let us call it a perfectly simple and rather obvious sex manifestation," said a psychiatrist chum when I pondered all this to him.

Ask any woman driver—here's the way it goes.

What madness comes over a man when he gets to me, and there I sit thinking grips with a STEERING WHEEL.

Wine, women, and song (though personally I've always doubted the effect of song) are as nothing compared with the effects of speed.

The nicest chaps I know are transformed into absolute dare-devils.

The not-so-nice turn into FIENDS—honking, cursing, grinding their teeth at every setback, forging ahead at any faint, and often doubtful, opportunity STEP ON IT.

And, just, let them see a woman ahead.

To them there is no more fearful sight than a WOMAN IN A CAR IN FRONT OF A MAN.

It's a matter of pride or something.

"Let us call it a perfectly simple and rather obvious sex manifestation," said a psychiatrist chum when I pondered all this to him.

Ask any woman driver—here's the way it goes.

The traffic lights are against me, and there I sit thinking shall we have the fish or the sweetbreads for supper tonight when a scree-e-ech—it's a man in a car rocking to a reluctant standstill by my side.

Immediately, he spots me he crashes into gear see-sawing to and fro in his determination to be first away.

He can't quite make it?

Then by golly I'm in for an uncomfortable few minutes as he darts out and darts back, hoots, darts, out again and so on.

Me and the MEN?

I wave them by at the earliest opportunity, languidly, gracefully.

"Three elementary sex urges are as clear as crystal to me" is what I'm signalling.

And between ourselves it's a tricky signal to make, gracefully, with the forearm and five fingers.)

With that's what I always do.

We-e-ell, almost always.

Now and then, however, I rip through my garage like a racing driver and give them a run for their money.

I don't dare to think what my psychiatrist chum would have to say about that!

The traffic lights are against me, and there I sit thinking

Vocational Discontent Or Just Spring Fever?

THIS is the time of year for spring fever, romance and playing hookey and, as I can tell by my mail, for contemplating a change of job.

I don't know why, but we all get restless and dissatisfied with no status quo during May. Many times it looks like a good idea to scrap the old job and get something new and interesting.

Obviously, sometimes it is the right thing to do. But more often it is just a symptom of spring fever and should be treated as such.

HOW CAN YOU TELL?

How can you tell if your vocational discontent really means that it's time to change jobs?

Here is a quick check list:

1. If it's a new idea that came in May, and that hasn't been in your mind for very long, chances are it will go as quietly as it came.

2. If you've been behind in your work, handling it lackadaisically or downright shiftlessly, chances are you shouldn't change.

UNFINISHED WORK

We all have periods when our virtue is not sufficient to keep us in top working form; times when we slide and let things up in the back of the desk. This piled-up, unfinished work gives us a kind of subconscious guilty feeling and we become convinced that what we need is a change of scene. But this is the wrong reason for changing jobs.

The only solution is simply to knock down and clean things up. After that, you still feel like changing; it might be that the desire is valid.

If you have just had the break-up of a big romance, chances are that your desire for a career change is invalid.

WON'T SOLVE ANYTHING

It's humiliating and heartbreaking to have to stay in the same office with the people who expected you to be married soon. But to run away from it isn't going to solve anything. Moreover, at a time like this you're apt to make hasty and unwise decisions.

At any rate, try not to make too fast a move in the wake of a broken heart.

If you are tired and run down physically, don't let yourself make a change in career. After all, at this time of year it's been a long time since you last vacation. It pays to wait until you've had one and rested up before you decide that you hate your job.

HAVE A CHECK-UP

Get to your doctor, have a physical check-up and see if that drained, exhausted feeling isn't physical instead of vocational.

However, if none of these things is the case, and a change in job is really indicated, do make it slowly. To paraphrase the old expression, "Change career in haste, repent at leisure."

Household Hints

An auto belt is one of the wisest investments you can make for your baby's safety—and your own. Some varieties permit the child to stand, sit or lie down. Many are washable.

If your woolens have a hard break-up, you might try rinsing them in lukewarm water with a pinch of borax. Proportion should be about one teaspoonful to a gallon of water.

Beware of the refrigerator that "just fits!" If you have to measure too closely to fit it into a niche, the refrigerator or freezer may not function properly.

The reason: there must be some room for air to circulate around the appliance to remove heat from the condenser.

In spite of the chemise lines in today's clothes, there are plenty of full skirts about. They are at their prettiest with stiff petticoats, and the best way to dry the latter is still over an open umbrella.

PRACTICAL HOMECRAFT

BEAUTY, COLOUR AND LUXURY ARE NOW A HOMEMAKERS'AIMS

YOU never know what designer will think up next! Now it's mink-trimmed bath sheets. Can any woman feel underprivileged when she can have mink in the bathroom?

This mink, we might as well tell you right now, is fake, but, it looks like the real thing—and it's washable!

One of the large department stores introduced these novel bath sheets recently, along with the idea that white fox throw—genuine fur—was just what every housewife needs!

DOWN-TO-EARTH AIDS

But, apart from these eccentricities there are lots of down-to-earth but charming items in home decorating just now such as sheets decorated with polka dots, plaid and pretty floral motifs. Favourite colours are nutmeg, bronze or wood violet.

The same colours and patterns are used for bed covers and dust ruffles or to trim towels and shower curtains.

Again, the same colour tones are used for informal table linens. A combination of jade and yellow now being promoted, is an ideal colour scheme for the seasons ahead.

We can now have beauty, colour and luxury these days in our necessities for the home and it's the kind that is so easy to care for. Many of these things are made of drip-dry fabrics and new finishes that require little or no ironing.

Contour sheets, for example, have eliminated the necessity of ironing bed linen. Automatic dryers turn out pillow cases so soft, so smooth that you can just fold them neatly and use them "as is".

Ruffles and pleats in blouses, dresses and lingerie, drip-dry like new. Even outer-wear has become easily washable and self-drying.

NUMBERED FLATIRONS

We can certainly congratulate ourselves on our good fortune when we consider a household hint of long ago that was quoted in a magazine recently. The ladies of 1907 were advised to number their flatirons on the stove with chalk and use them in rotation so that they would always be hot!

While ironing is no longer a chore, there are still times when some ironing has to be done, so a good iron is a

BUSY LINE

PRETTY Patricia Krauth always wanted to be a nurse and take care of children, but she never dreamed that she'd be ministering to between 100 and 200 infants daily.

The 31-year-old Brunette may have the country's most unusual nursing job. She manages the baby station at Disneyland Amusement Park.

This is a small but very important corner of Walt Disney's "Magic Kingdom" where only babies count.

"You should hear some of the things that people have to say about our station after they've brought in their wet, hungry, fussy babies," said Mrs. Krauth.

"We have a diaper changing room with hospital-type equipment, real small toilets, a fully equipped kitchen for parents to prepare food, a feeding room, high chairs and a screened off area for mothers who breastfeed their babies. And it's all free."

Mrs. Krauth is particularly proud of a reception room where fathers can wait if mothers are handling babies, and a side visitor finds stroller parking lanes carefully marked on the road by the curb.

"We've planned the station in such a way that an infant makes a trip through it without having to double back. Keeps things going more smoothly, but mothers never get the feeling of assembly line."

Mrs. Krauth, who lives with her husband, Frederick, a former Navy flier from Cincinnati, said many mothers are startled when they learn that the makers of a baby food (Pablum) are fooling the bill. She said the guest register reflects their thanks and includes comments such as:

"Wonderful and thanks," "The best ride yet."

At 50, I'm looking ahead to the best time of the lot!

LIVING LONGER by LADY PAKENHAM

Talking to EILEEN ASCROFT

A GLORIOUS spree with her grandchildren is Lady Pakenham's No. 1 objective for her bonus 20 years—that EXTRA 20 years of living that modern science and medicine has given us during the last century.

With four sons and four daughters and a husband interested in banking, industry and politics, there has been little time for pleasure travel.

"I like to think that when I am 70," she says, "and my one-year-old granddaughter Rebecca, will be 21, we shall be many miles together to all the places I want to see, like Persia, Mexico and South America."

This surprisingly youthful grandmother is enthusiastic about her extra 20 years. "I'm the thin and wiry kind, and I know I will stay fit genetically." Already she is laying plans for what she calls the "Golden Years that start at 70."

"I'm mad keen on gardening," she says, "but I am always so busy in there is never time to sit down and enjoy it." Her digging out underplanting has

"I've planned the station in such a way that an infant makes a trip through it without having to double back. Keeps things going more smoothly, but mothers never get the feeling of assembly line."

"I would really like to try and understand modern poetry," she tells me. "Also to be able to discuss religion intelligently with my grandchildren."

She plans to shed domestic responsibilities as the next years go by. "There has got to be a house in the country for family gatherings," she says, "but already I am replacing all the labour-makers, like bollers that need stoking and knick-knacks that need dusting, in our Hurst Green home."

"Nurseries and dining-rooms will be discarded. In future we will organise living. In much fewer rooms. My home when I am older will be trouble-free so that I can really enjoy my family without chores."

REVIVAL

Looking forward again, Lady Pakenham plans to bring back the old institution of afternoon tea and leisurely conversation.

"The years of bringing up my eight children have meant nursery or dining room tins, and old people, I think, need lots of company and stimulating ideas to keep them fresh and happy. I will need my friends then and plan to enjoy them."

"Another needly in age," Lady Pakenham believes, is the feeling of being essential. She intends to do active organising

"To give an old person somewhere to live is not enough," she says. "Finding a contribution they can make to society is even more important."

Loneliness is the disease of old age, and it need not be. "I shall organise a proper club for grandmothers all around me to do important social work," she says.

What are the personal indulgences you plan for the Golden Years?" I asked. Lady Pakenham, "I am going to be more of a lady in a dressing gown," she laughed.

"Lastly—probably the most important of all—she wants to spend more time with her husband as a companion and a friend, free from children's care correctly dressed before household life begins. I will take things easier and breakfast, if I feel like it, in a pretty negligee."

Lady Pakenham, at 50, does not wear glasses and plans to do fine embroidery when 70. "If they are going to keep me alive they have got to keep my eyes good," she remarks cheerfully.

"I've always adored embroidery and never had time. The last thing I did was smocking my daughter Catherine's dress when she was a baby."

Before her eldest daughter Antonio was born, Lady Pakenham reveals, she was rather a plump, hockey-playing type of girl. Antonio streamlined her figure and for 25 years she has weighed the same—6st. 6lb.

"I shan't watch the scales so carefully in the last 20 years," she says happily. "If I want to share my great-grandson's hunk of chocolate I shall. I shall drink wine with every meal and enjoy real afternoon tea."

"Another dream of the future is to keep a dog and give to him all the time and attention he deserves. A beautiful red setter decorative and large, or a cute poodle, although my family hate them."

"Science and medicine will know how to keep us healthy and energetic, good-looking and slim. Labour-saving gadgets will set us free from toil. Who one will expect us to sit knitting in a armchair?"

"Women today have everything to look forward to in the later years. BUT WHY? We should no longer be surplus to our needs," says Lady Pakenham. "In fact, we shall probably become a rare and precious species, and be treasured by the male sex."

Don't Let Your Baby Become Too Dependent

MANY a mother is so conscientious that she never leaves her baby or young child. As a result, this youngster can't be happy out of her sight. Some young mothers even boast that the baby "won't even stay with Dad or Grandma."

TOGETHER TOO MUCH

When this happens, a mother must leave this child under her care all the time when she tries to do her work. Stay down to read or relax, she must take baby in her arms. If she puts him in a play pen, she must be right there to amuse him. All day long, unless the younger has a nap, she must be with him. Even if she has another person to do her work, she may be worn out before night.

Wise, she may put him in his play pen near an open door, so that he can see her at work in another room. If she does this very often, however, he will demand it and will yell when she must go to another part of the house.

If your youngster, before walking, demands you come to his play pen to amuse him, let him cry or scream for a few minutes before you go. Then, give him a few minutes, and return to what you were doing.

Pursue this practice. When he cries for you, let him wait a few minutes at first, then longer, as he grows older and makes constant demands on you to amuse him. Be skilful at finding approved toys with which he can amuse himself.

When Dad or others are around, let him look after him. Stay out of his sight for short periods, then longer ones. Even go out of the house for a short while, letting him see you go. Leave him with a familiar person. Gradually make your outings longer.

By and by, leave him while you and Dad have an evening out. Pay attention to his crying after you do depart. Let him know beforehand that you are going out.

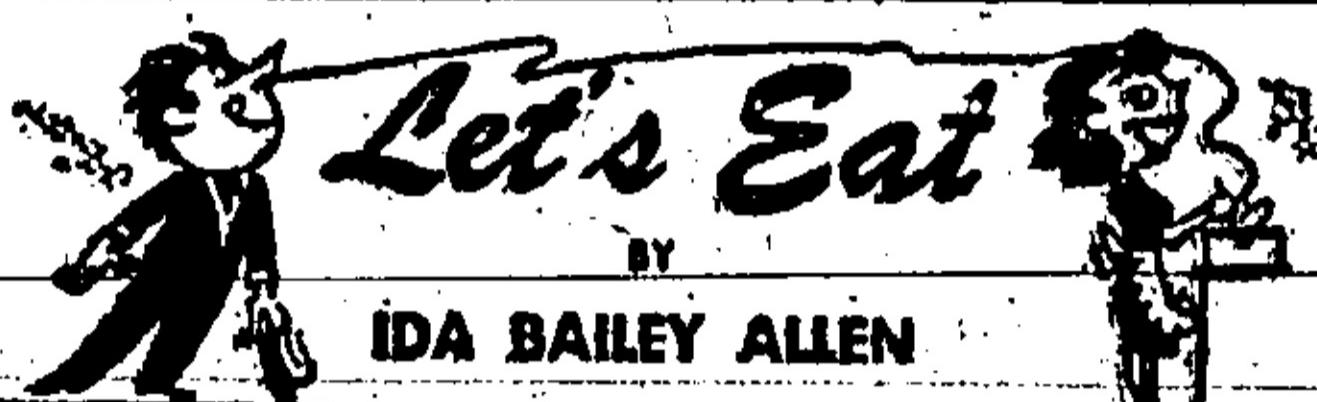

As soon as your youngster can run about, see that he plays with another child of his age and with more children later. The more he mingles with playmates, the less dependent emotionally he will be on you. Nevertheless, you will always deserve some brief periods to talk with him, make and do things with him, read to him, play with him. Just see that he is not his slave.

IRISH HOTEL MAN OFFERS NEW VEGETABLE IDEAS

"WERE you brought up to go into the hotel business?" I asked.

William J. Kelly of Ireland

"I was born into it. My grandfather built the Strand Hotel in Rosslare. Later my father ran it, and now it's my operation. After surviving three generations of Kellys, it's still going strong."

Self-Contained Hotel

"It's different from any hotel I've seen in the United States, run-in," he continued. "Rosslare is what might be called 'self-contained.'

"We have our own herd of Jersey cows; produce our own veg. We raise our own chickens and ducks; produce our own eggs. The pigs and hams are

"We raise all our own fruit and vegetables; lots of celerine, Brussels sprouts, potatoes, turnips, carrots and beets; tomatoes and cucumbers, string beans and wax beans, also the Scarlet runner broad beans which, I understand, you do not use much in the United States, and a type of lettuce that is different from the kind you have here, for it's crisp and yet soft."

"As yet, the Irish haven't learned to like green corn, although we can raise it if it can be made a fashion."

"All the vegetables we serve are garden-fresh."

"We have another very particular about the way we cook vegetables, often sautéing them with fresh herbs from the kitchen garden."

"Come and visit us sometime."

I asked Mr. Kelly if I couldn't wait to hop over. Pending that time, I'm enjoying vegetables prepared in his own unusual ways.

SIR BEVERLEY BAXTER M.P. says:

"It is still the best Club in Europe"

THERE is a somewhat malicious story told of the Athenaeum Club in London that a member in the reading room rang for the hall porter and said: "Will you please take that gentleman away. He has been dead for two days." That, of course, was in the spacious days when, demnit all, a club was really something.

The club as an institution, is a logical and inevitable development of the English character. First it is a home from home where the male can escape from the devoted tyranny of his family. Secondly, it is a place where a chap can have a sleep after a hearty luncheon and can even smoke if it is not too stentorian. In fact membership in a club is the lush Edwardian days were so highly regarded that when R. D. Blumenthal, the then Editor of the Daily Express was offered a knighthood he said that he would rather be made a member of the Carlton Club which was then a massive temple in Carlton House Terrace devoted to the Conservative cause.

Undoubtedly London has the finest clubs in the world, not necessarily in architecture but in character and tradition. Yet it has been known for generations, is not a Club at all. And what is it called? Some vulgar souls speak of it as "the Talking Shop" but its actual title is "The House of Commons."

Let us consider the privileges which are conferred upon the members who incidentally have not been proposed and seconded but automatically become members as soon as they have been elected by a constituency and have taken the oath.

Since in Parliament we make the laws we are to some extent above the law. That is the Parliament we elect. That is why Public Europe must serve drinks only at stated hours, we in the Commons, have no limitations. If there is a late sitting that keeps us there until the first streaks of dawn are in the sky M.P.'s can have alcoholic refreshment up to half an hour after the debate ends and they depart for home.

In fact the smoking room is the very holy of holies where no stranger, however exalted, can enter. Now, however, exalted one is. No peer unless he goes there. No peer unless he goes at one time a member of the House of Commons, is entitled to come into the smoking room. We do not suggest that if a peer strayed in by mistake or through ignorance that we would throw him out but he would soon realize that he had broken the code.

There is no special seat in the smoking room for any member of the House although Sir Winston Churchill, who is terminally an exception to the rule, always sits in a certain corner seat and still certain members of the committee forums before the fire of 1834, and it was rebuilt in two sections. One is for good conversation and refreshment, while the other permits the game of chess to be played—the only game allowed.

IS IKE CHARY OF MEETING KRUSHCHEV'S WISECRACKS?

by CHRISTOPHER DOBSON

I WONDER what's really behind President Eisenhower's rediscovered hesitancy to take part in a Summit meeting with Krushchev. Ike's friends in Washington are saying that he and Secretary of State Dulles are worried about getting the President—any President of the United States—embroiled in the diplomatic infighting of international politics.

They point to the example of President Wilson, whose prestige was hurt by the part he played in the negotiations at Versailles. Eisenhower's men talk of Russian "ticks" and ask what is the point of the President lending his presence to a Russian propaganda benefit?

But I wonder. I wonder if Eisenhower's hesitancy is not something more personal than a desire to keep the prestige of the American presidency out of international politics.

For Ike, an honest, forthright man, has none of Krushchev's guile; he has none of the Russian dictator's brilliantly evil wit. And, since his serious illnesses, he has lost some of his ability to concentrate.

Cosseted

OFTEN I have seen the way he is shielded and cosseted by his Press secretary James Hagerty, and the shadow President Sherman Adams.

I have seen the gentle way in which the Washington correspondents have treated him when he has stumbled over his words at his Press conference.

WILL AMERICA WIN THIS RACE TO THE MOON?

THE SIGNS ARE THAT THE FIRST TRIAL ROCKET WILL BE GOING ON ITS WAY THIS WEEK . . .

NEW YORK. AMERICAN scientists are preparing for an early attempt to hit the moon with rockets and have made such excellent progress that the first phase of Operation Moon is about to begin.

Their activities are being conducted in such secrecy that the American public, and even many Government officials, are not yet aware of the rapid progress of their work.

Operation Moon is far nearer than has been admitted to date, said a Defence Department spokesman. There will be three phases involved in the plan to reach the moon and each will take rockets closer to their destination.

Combination

A new space satellite will use a combination of air force and navy rockets—the Thor and Vanguard. They are already on the launching pad at Cape Canaveral, Florida. Actual blast-off date for this first phase and the other two, however, will not be announced until each effort has been successful.

American officials greatly fear the international repercussions from failure of any Moon project. Colonel William Davis, of the Air Force Department of Scientific Research said grimly: "If this contest is lost we might as well quit."

While officials were hesitant to talk about the newest rocket combination at Cape Canaveral, great activity at the base indicated that the firing signal may come any day this week.

Direction

The missile will be fired, according to some sources, in the direction of the moon—the first to be deposited on such a definite destination into space.

It is not intended to reach the moon but the missile will permit scientists in Florida to determine their ability to hit the moon in future tries.

The third phase would involve hitting the moon with rocket-carrying heavy equipment including radio transmitters and a magnesium flare dye which can also be seen from earth.

Half chance

Scientists give their projects a good 50-50 chance of reaching their destination once they reach "escape" velocity of about 25,000 miles per hour.

Second phase of the operation will be possible only a few weeks after the first phase if that proves successful.

Estimates for timing such flights range from 25 to 27 hours.

This will involve shooting a missile directly at the moon and this missile, as scientists testified before the House of Representatives Space Commissioner of the missile's third stage said.

He was Charles Battley, president of Grand Central Rocket Company at Redlands, California, who declared that the rocket was designed and the propellant developed for it as early as 1950.

"The propellant has been improved since then, and we have no doubt of its ability to thrust the rocket on to the surface of the moon without difficulty," he said.

Big cameras

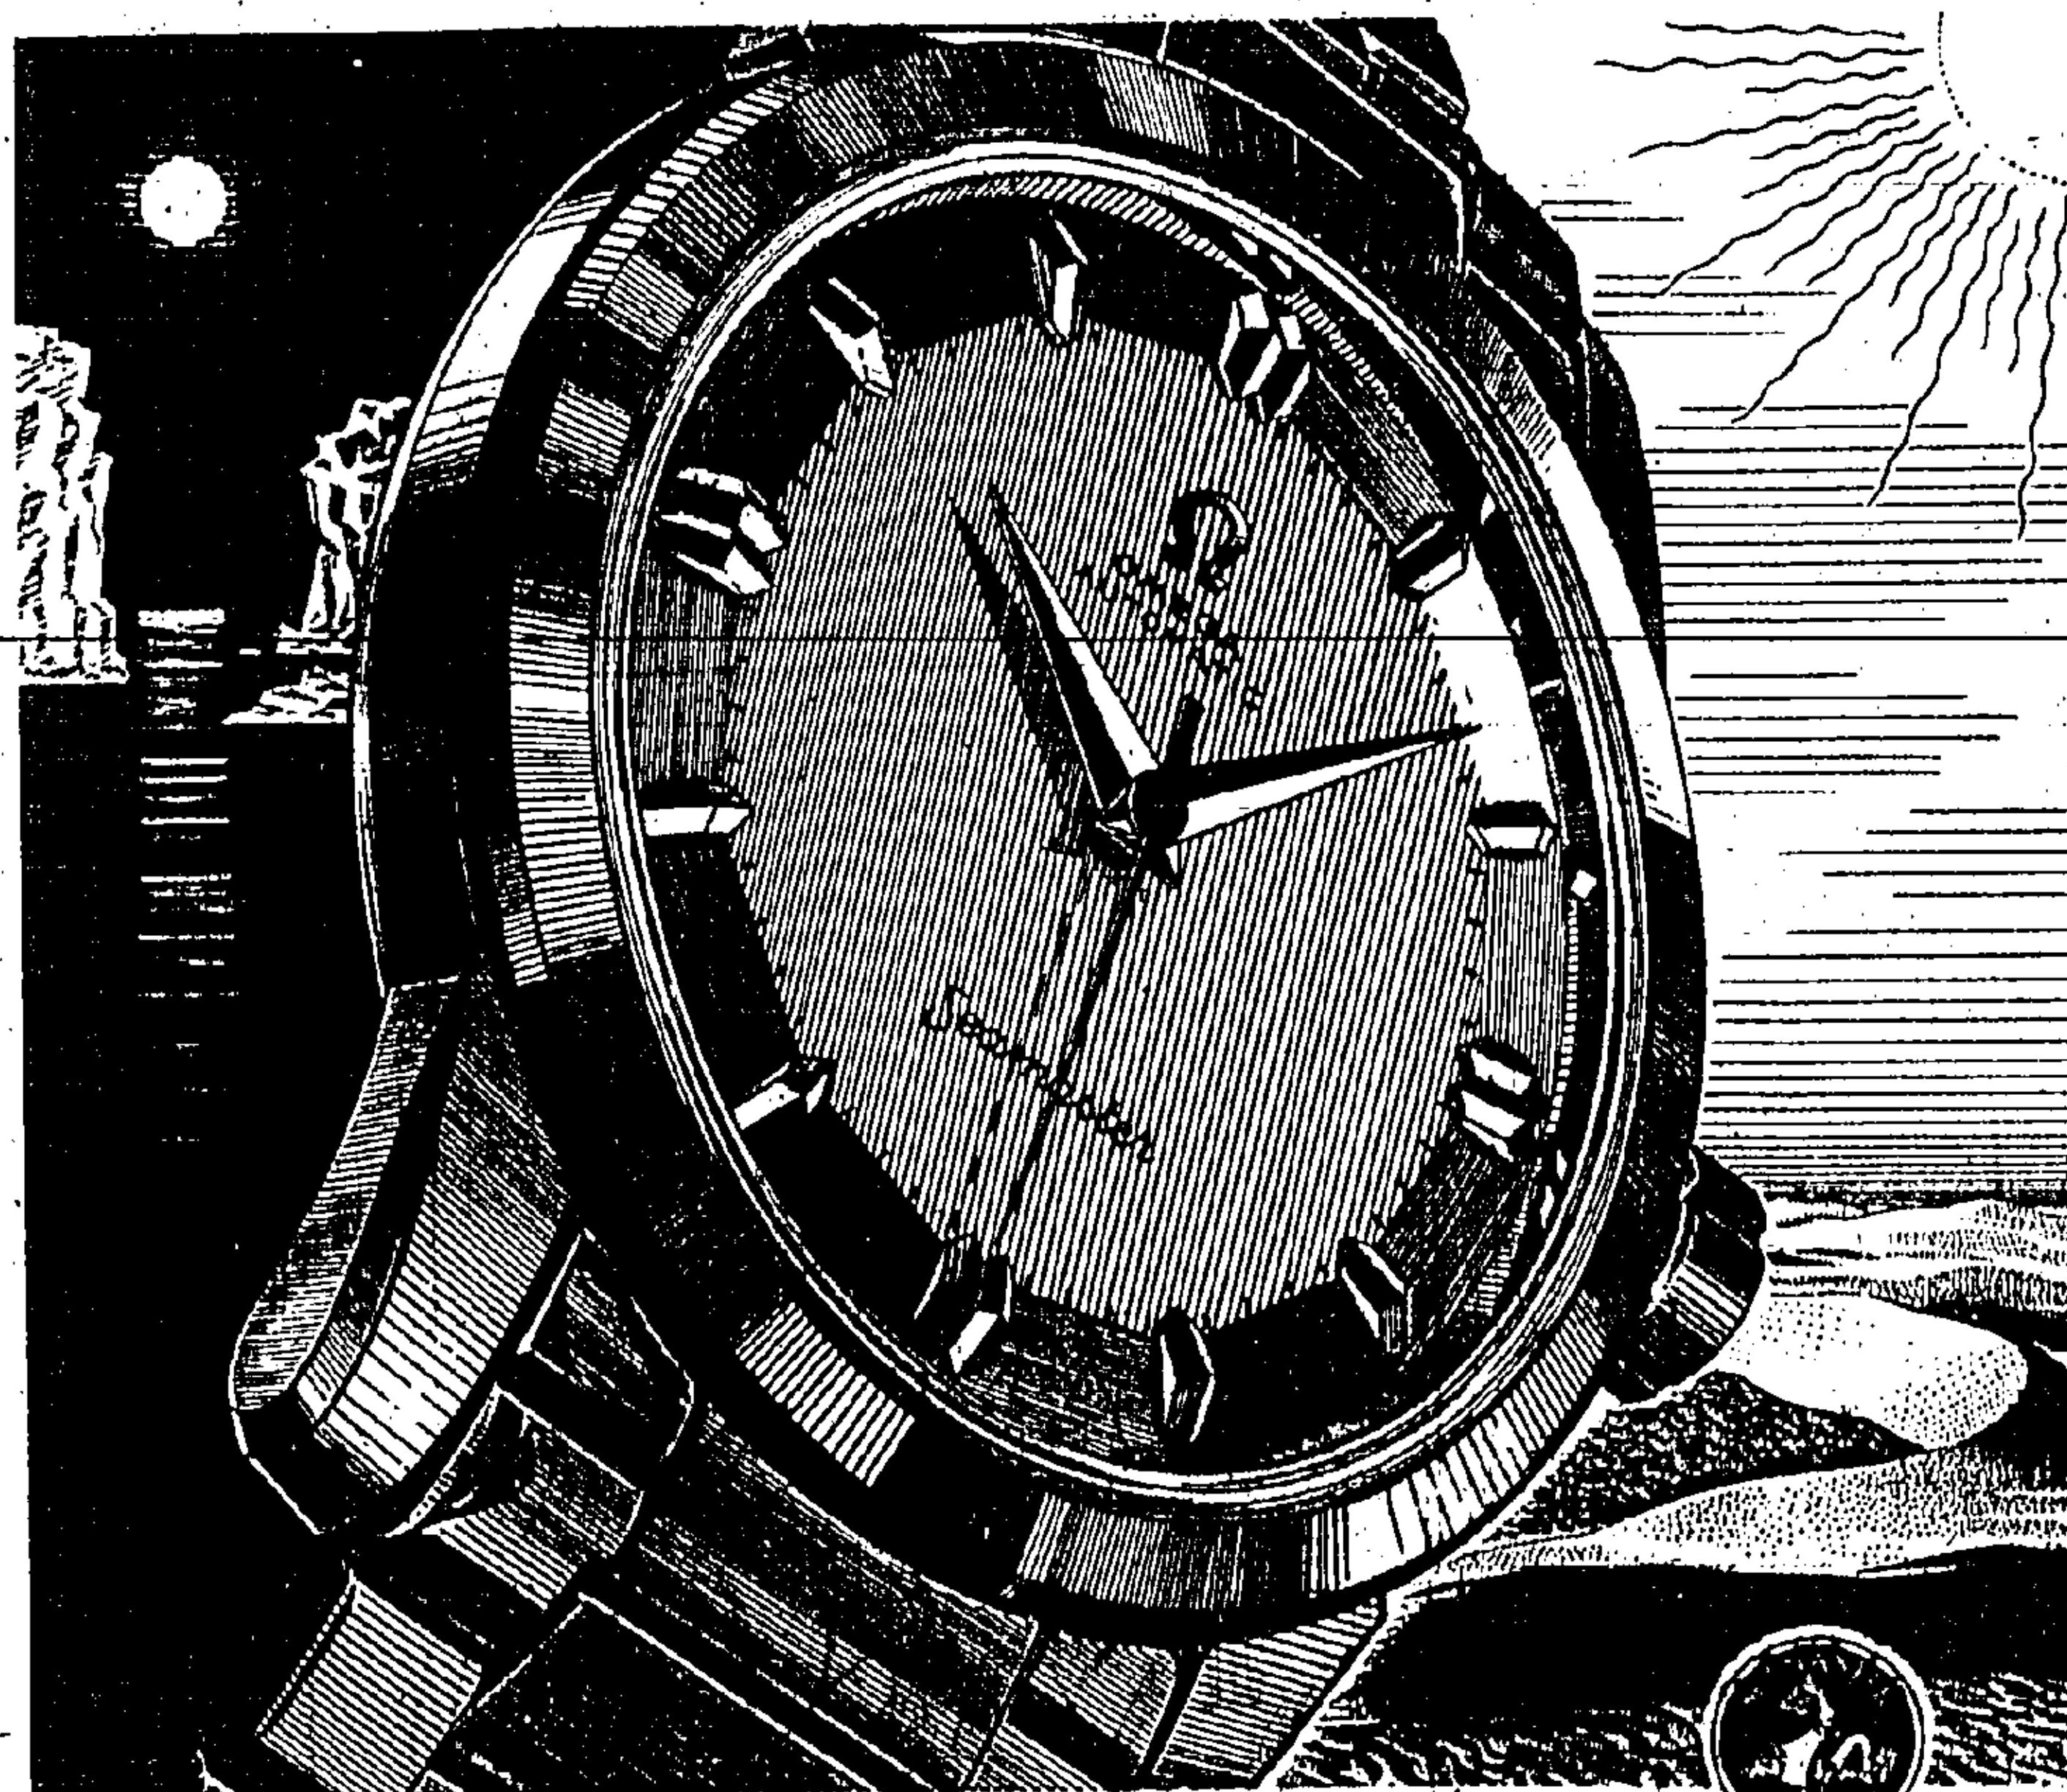

The New York Times' missile expert points out that such cameras in an attempt to reach the moon would be almost useless because it would not be possible to gather any scientific data from it.

The Russian newspaper Pravda last month reported that a network of 24 photographic observation posts should be fully equipped by the first quarter of next year. The news was not ready when Russia launched its first two satellites last October and November.

Even the United States, with its superiority in equipment, has had great difficulty in getting tracking stations ready around the world. Officials admit that some of the cameras, which are extremely bulky, won't be ready until June.

However, Willy Ley, one of America's top rocket experts, has voiced the assurance of other scientists when he declared: "We know more right now of what is required of a moon space ship—even though none has been built—than ship-builders of Columbus's day knew of what makes a ship seaworthy."

The Olympic Cross

Only watch manufacturer to be honored with this distinguished award, Omega has timed the Olympic Games for over 25 years. Today, Omega enjoys the implicit confidence of the international sports community when Olympic records and medals are at stake and time is reckoned in 10ths and 100ths of a second.

Engineering in the sizzling heat of the Sahara; scientists in the ice-bound solitude of the Arctic; sportsmen in the dim depths that are skin-diver's realm—here is the kind of company you keep when you wear the Seamaster, the self-winding Omega high-precision watch that defies the elements.

The self-winding Seamaster movement is triple sealed. The elements can't reach it. Tropical heat leaves it cold. Arctic cold leaves it snugly indifferent. Accurately and reliably, the Seamaster ticks off the most exciting seconds of your life.

Wear the Seamaster, and you participate in one of the great watch-making success stories of our time. The story goes back to World War II when Omega was commissioned to design a watch the soldiers, sailors and pilots of Britain could confidently take with them into combat. Restyled and reinforced for sports wear, this watch became the post-war Seamaster, since further strengthened and perfected, and today the world's most popular sportswatch. Also battle tested, in submarine hulls and jet aircraft fuel tanks, is the sealing device which protects the Seamaster movement against water and condensation to a depth of two hundred feet.

Armored ruggedness and Omega precision—these make of the Seamaster a timepiece that has what it takes to share with you the zest of high adventure and the stresses and strains that go with it.

NOEL GOODWIN ON THE 'BIG PACK' FESTIVAL DISCS

THE four days of concerts by top jazz groups of all kinds, in a vast open-air setting called Freebody Park, at Newport, Rhode Island, clocked in more than 50,000 listeners last July.

I have been listening to the first half-dozen of the 14 LP discs recorded on the spot.

Among the outstanding performers you should certainly make a date with an exotic, almond-eyed beauty called TOSHIKO AKIYOSHI.

Remarkable

She is 29, born in Manchuria, and a jazz pianist of remarkable artistry. You can hear her on Columbia 33CX.10101, a 12in. LP she shares with the swinging blind accordionist LEON SASH and Quartet (*).

Like this one, many of the Newport Festival discs are shared between two groups—one to each side. But not all are paired off in equal merit.

Three lusty numbers with trumpeter RUBY BRAFF leading an eight-piece band, including PEE WEE RUSSELL on clarinet, are exciting listening on 33CX.10104. It would rate * for these alone, but pianist BOBBY HENDERSON's solos on the reverse are distinctly mediocre.

Festivals are meant for experiments as well as standard successes, don't forget. Two of the most forward-looking sessions were played by GIGI GRICE-DONALD BYRD group and the CECIL TAYLOR Quartet.

They each have three tracks on 33CX.10102. Forceful, punchy bop from alto-saxist Gryce and trumpeter Byrd; subtle and thoughtful twists of harmony from Taylor's piano ().

Off-days

Top-ranking singers ELLA FITZGERALD and BILLIE HOLIDAY both apparently had off-days at Newport (33CX.10100). You can hear them in

— AND THE TOP POPS

by JOHN LAMBERT

 PETULA CLARK "Baby Lover" (Nixa): Should make a hit pick of pop hits for Petula. But I feel her recording manager merits most praise. Miss Clark's singing talent is slight, but it is slickly presented. This time the impact is provided by a calypso-rock beat.

 ROBERT EARL "I May Never Pass This Way Again" (Phillips): And I may never want to listen to another mushy ballad with a message like this again. Four versions on sale feature everything from celestial choirs to solemn guitar strumming. I choose Earl because he manages to sound sincere, in spite of the sentimentality. His soaring finely-balanced voice is worth listening to anyway.

 SAMMY KAYE "Garden of Allah" (Fontana): A big bid is going on to boost ballads with an Oriental flavour. Most of them are strictly Japanese corn. This one has the merits of a strong melody and stylish presentation.

* ANNA MAGNANI "Scapricciatello" (H.M.V.): An outlandish entry for the pop market. The title is too much of a mouthful. The singer is much stronger when acting than when chirping. Yet somehow I found the record delightful. It just happens to be a wonderful note.

The American idol faces a crisis

BY LOVE POSSESSED. By James Gould Cozzens. Longmans. 18s. 570 pp.

THE American novelist James Gould Cozzens had written seven novels before this, all warmly received by a small devoted public. And then, suddenly, By Love Possessed, became for some reason the big best seller of last year. It is hard to understand quite why. Not that it isn't a very good novel. It is. It has some claims to being a great one. But it is long, subtle and difficult. It is a very literary novel, in the Henry James tradition.

Why, then, was it so popular? Perhaps because its main figure is an ideal American type, Arthur Winner, in his fifties, is a partner in a highly respected firm of lawyers in a prosperous small New England town. He is a figure in the community, as his father was before him. At his age he stands between the past and the present. He was brought up in the fine old tradition, but he is not too set in his ways to see that today's morals and manners are different from yesterday's. He is a man of great perception and of great good sense. Take him a problem, whether small or large, and he will give it the whole of his attention. He will judge it with balance and compass.

—RICHARD LISTER

(London Express Service).

Problems

Many problems, small and large, are brought to him in the course of the forty-nine hours which the novel covers, and we watch him dealing with them, dispassionately neatly and economically. The kid brother of the firm's secretary gets himself involved in a charge of rape; Arthur Winner gets him out of it. The new rector is having serious trouble with the organist; Arthur Winner effects a compromise. Noah Tuttle, the young man of the firm, is not doing an' a bit' past it has insulted an important Jewish lawyer from New York. Arthur Winner smooths things over.

There are family problems, business problems, legal problems.

Then in the last hour of the 49 he is faced with the most difficult problem of all, a problem of his own. Old Noah Tuttle has all these years been juggling the trust funds, not dishonestly, but quite illegally. Discover it, as he should do, and there is ruin and disgrace all round. Leave things as they are,

FICTION SHELF BY PHILIP OAKES

• SHADOW OF A SPY. By Andrew Mackenzie. Boardman, 10s. 6d.—Anxious American hires British private-eye to discover why he cannot visit his brother, gaoled for selling atomic secrets. Hectic espionage stuff, with kidnapping, murder, a slant-eyed blonde, and gun-toting peers to speed the action. Rather knockabout, but you keep on reading.

• OR BE HE DEAD. By James Byrom. Chatto and Windus, 18s. 6d.—Stylish, civilised crime novel with a writer hero trying to protect himself from libel by tracing a vanished Edwardian rogue, he has put into a book. Rugged here and there, and little over-jolly, but polished, engaging and very well written.

• MURDER ON MY STREET. By Edwin Lanham. Gollancz, 12s. 6d.—Tough city editor of New York daily suspected of killing a neighbourhood girl, involved in blackmail and dope-dealing. Good Chase ending, with speedboats and helicopters speeding to the rescue of child witness. Assorted newspaper types and authentic-sounding office intrigues.

• NIGHT OF THE HORNS. By Douglas Sanderson. Secker and Warburg, 12s. 6d.—Ultra-violent thriller featuring idealistic lawyer with faithless wife who gets herself strangled. Lots of heating-up and a strong dash of sex. Very fast and readable, so long as you can suspend your disbelief among the thuds and bloodstains.

• NIGHT EXTRA. By William McGivern. Collins, 10s. 6d.

Really first-rate story of newspaper reporter tough enough to try into a graft-hidden political campaign. Engrossing, characterisation and dialogue all bristle with life. McGivern moves up to the W. R. Burnett-Raymond Chandler League with this one.

Baruch Races To A Fortune —By Loco

MR BARUCH. By Margaret L. Collyer. 42s. 784 pages.

THE tall, white-haired man sat on the same park bench in Lafayette Square, Washington, most days during the war. The tall man sat there so regularly that letters were addressed and delivered to him at the bench. They were addressed to Mr Bernard Baruch, Baruch is one of those individuals round whom a legend has grown up in his own lifetime. Nobody can quite say why, but everybody in America knows that he is immensely distinguished, wise, experienced, the confidant of Presidents. He is a pillar of the United States, an oracle whose views are awaited with respect, whose homely obiter dicta are reverently printed.

Example: "Two things are of importance. Unhappily, it is also intolerably diffuse. He was attracted by the idealism of Woodrow Wilson."

The sad result is that Mr Baruch gets mislaid in his own high government post—and the biography is the myth, then, greater than the man? That ships, that with Winston Churchill.

Baruch, it seems, is one of those who prefer power to responsibility. Had he not been done to earn his unassassable position on the American Olympust?

The question ought to be answered by Margaret L. Collyer. It is very long (approx. 210,000 words) and full

Has Israel Altered The Jew?

THE FIRST TEN YEARS. By Walter Eytan. Goldsfield and Nicolson. 21s.

THE publishers of this book about the first ten years of Israel inform us that the author is uniquely qualified to give a firsthand account of Israel's struggle for recognition because he has, from the outset, been Director-General of the Israeli Foreign Ministry. This is a double-edged claim for it is a curiosity of history that those who have taken part in great events often make the worst recorders of them.

One-sided

We are also told that he does not write as a partisan. This claim made me open the book with high expectations, soon, alas, to be dashed.

For it immediately plunges into a long one-sided account of the negotiations that preceded the setting up of the State of Israel, the recognition of the State, de facto in some instances, de jure in others, and the endless technical arguments that have taken place in the General Assembly and Security Council of the United Nations during the last ten years. Indeed, the chief interest in these pages rests on their illustration of the fatuity of UNO as a peace-making body.

Sometimes, however, the open-eyed innocence of the author goes too far, as when he writes of the terrible Arab exodus of 1948. "How could all these people, ordinary folk, almost a thousand families, rich and poor, old and young, have packed their chattels and taken themselves off into the night? Someone had organised it, but who and why?"

If he is still in doubt, let him turn to the terrible conclusion of Professor Toynebeau's "that in A.D. 1948 the Jews knew from personal experience what they were doing, and it was their inherent tragedy that the lesson learned by them from their encounter with the Nazi German Goitiles should have been not to eschew, but to imitate some of the evil deeds that the Nazis had committed against the Jews."

It is true that this book is a diplomatic history, but that is no reason for refraining from giving a place of pride to the physical efforts of the Israelis.

For it was that effort that impressed the world and persuaded it that Israel as an entity should survive. And the true glory of Israel is the actual achievement of the working Israeli in the country districts.

It is impossible for anyone with feeling to have gone to Israel during the last 10 years and not to have had a lump in his throat. There before his very eyes were the sights of men and women without apparent consideration of individuality, tilling by the selfless labour of their hands a wilderness of rock and parched earth and goat pasture into terraces from which it could be imagined would flow milk and honey.

Humourless

This side of the scene the book completely ignores and instead of pictorial illustrations of such changes, almost reminiscent of human effort, we are given an awful photograph: the drollness efficient, the possibly useful, the undeniably striking-looking lady Charge d'Affaires in Montevideo.

There is another question posed by the humours of this book: and the present rigidity of Israeli diplomacy. Does that subtlety which has always been the characteristic of the Jew, his distinctive badge among all nations, disappear when he becomes an Israeli? Does he, when he settles his roots in his own soil, lose that subtlety of feeling which has over him his hallmark? Will that pliability which has preserved a wandering nation for 2,000 years vanish in a generation? It is to be hoped not.

'Beginners Please' Resumes Talent Spotting Series With John Wallace

Radio Hongkong launches the first programme in their talent spotting series on Friday evening at 8.30, when compere John Wallace introduces the contestants in the first heat of "Beginners Please," and opens the door of opportunity for any would-be entertainer who can satisfy the audition panel of an ability to provide radio entertainment in any form whatsoever.

Vocalists, mimics, impressionists, comedians, amateur musical groups, individual musicians, whistlers—and in fact any solo or combination performers are invited to submit their names to Radio Hongkong where arrangements will be made for an early audition.

On each programme of the series, the heat winners, judged by three judges in a remote studio, will be qualified to go forward to the final of the whole series, where they will compete with other heat winners for one of the "Beginners Please" three cash prizes.

This afternoon at Happy Valley racegoers will see one of the classics of the Hongkong racing calendar, The HK Derby. But interest in this event is not by any means confined to our enthusiasts; people throughout the Colony have subscribed to the regular Jockey Club cash sweep on the event.

Many thousands of dollars in cash prizes await the lucky ticket holders and nows of the pattering at the end of the race is eagerly awaited everywhere.

To bring to listeners an up-to-the-minute description of the race, Radio Hongkong will be broadcasting a commentary by Ted Thomas and Tim Brinton from the Jockey Club Pavilion.

The programme will start at 3.50 p.m. when Tim Brinton will size up the horses in the paddock, and discuss the odds accumulating on the pari-mutuel totalisator.

Then at 4 p.m. as the horses canter up to the starting gate, Ted Thomas will take over with a description of the actual race. I hope that the winning sweep ticket numbers will become available during the time the commentators are on the air, in which case they will be broadcast immediately.

For those who still maintain an interest in horse racing, there will be a commentary on the Great Jubilee Handicap at Kempton Park this evening.

At a 11.15 Radio Hongkong will be joining listeners to the General Overseas Service of the BBC for a commentary on this event by Raymond Glendenning.

GRAND OPERA SEASON

Irene Yuen has selected "Rigoletto" as the first complete opera to be broadcast in the news series Grand Opera at 8.15 tomorrow evening.

In each of these six programmes, comprising the Radio Hongkong Opera Season, a full and complete recording of some of the best known operas will be presented.

Tomorrow afternoon at 1 p.m. Tim Brinton will be chatting about the films available to weekend moviegoers in a new programme called "Who's for a Film?"

I COULD HAVE BEEN MISTAKEN

...But These Were My Candidates For The Footballer Of The Year

Says I. M. MacTAVISH

During this week I have been wondering about the players you will nominate for the proud title of 'Hongkong's Footballer of the Year'... and at this moment you have the great advantage over me of knowing who has in fact topped the poll.

As I write, of course, the result has not been announced and I am in consequence completely in the dark as to how the ballot has gone. With all these points in mind I thought it might be interesting to have a go at trying to pick the favourites and let you read my reasoning after you have studied the result.

First, however, let me remind you of the simple rules governing the competition and review the winners in the years since the competition was launched by the China Mail in 1954.

Readers of this newspaper were asked to nominate by popular vote the player of the year on the qualifications of ability and sportsmanship. To my mind these are the idealistic essentials for all players who aspire to greatness in the public eye and past winners of the award have certainly met these requirements in generous measure.

For three years the winner virtually selected himself and in turn there was general acclaim for Mike Granger of the Army in the inaugural ballot, for Tong Sheung in 1955, and for great-hearted Ho Cheung-yau in the following year.

A Change

In 1957 something of a change came over the situation and for the first time there was no immediately obvious choice. Many fans believed Ho Cheung-yau would repeat his 1956 success, but when the votes were counted it was Yu Cheuk-yan who claimed the crown.

South China's brilliant little inside-left was popular selection and for the third time in four years a Caroline Hill favourite won the season's proudest title.

All these things, however important and significant, are now history and a look round the current scene shows that once again there is a comparatively small field of real contenders, even allowing, of course, for the fact that there will always be a number of players who will receive personal fan votes without managing to get into the final running for the award.

South China's record of four wins out of five since the ballot started suggests that we should have a look among the Caroline Hill's players for possible candidates. Ho Cheung-yau and Yu Cheuk-yan must surely be among the names on the short list from which the winner will be found.

Real Outsider

Strangely enough, in spite of the success achieved by the South China team this season, there are few others at Caroline Hill who fill the requirements of the competition, although Moi Chun-wah will almost certainly get a share of the votes.

I think the real outsider of this year's competition will be Wong Chi-kwong whose flashing dashes up and down the right wing have made him a great favourite with the crowds... and in fact there are those close to the game who are confidently tipping him as the Footballer of the Year.

Outside of these players KMB would seem to have strong contenders in Lo Pak and Lau Kai-sing, but no one else among the Busmen will produce a serious challenge to the South China stars. In this season's disappointing Kitchie team only Szeto Yiu and in lesser degree, Chan Fai-hung and newcomer, Leung Wah-hung are worthy of consideration.

Eastern also have had an indifferent season and their players have suffered in consequence. There may be some support for Ho Ying-fun who, although now very much in the veteran class, has his admirers.

Already the list is running dry and it is difficult to find any possible nominations in the ranks of Kwing Wah, CAA, Jardine, Club or RAF. Roy Moxon of the Police is certainly a player whose sportsmanship and ability bring him into the reckoning, but Tung Wah have no candidates that I can spot.

Army's Two

The Army have Mendrum and McNicol and while the goal-keeper has had to wait a long time for his chance in top class company, Mendrum has been a prop and pillar in a very shaky collection of soldiers throughout the season.

The wing half is now playing at the top of his form and, while it is true his early season conduct would not have helped him in a competition of this nature, he has changed to such an extent that there can now be no complaint of any kind against him.

There is something which many keen followers of the game want to acknowledge in the Footballer of the Year poll. Well, that's the field as I see it. I think the winner this year will once again come from South China and while Ho Cheung-yau and Yu Cheuk-yan are the established darlings of the crowds they may have to resist a strong challenge from their pint-sized clubmate Wong Chi-kwong.

Beyond that limit it seems to me that only Szeto Yiu and Mendrum are really a danger, although Moi may emerge as a dark horse of the ballot box if he gets the backing of the powerful Police Sports Organisation.

These are my purely personal views... I may be very wrong of the mark... but at least you have the result to guide you in your assessment of my reasoning. No brickbats... or bouquets please...

for this is a most difficult competition to judge, and whenever wind is your choice and that is what I could have a peek into the crystal ball I write this. It would help a lot.

Significant

Looking through the final placings in the various sections of the English League one comes across some very interesting statistics which give significant pointers to the sort of soccer entertainment served up by the different teams during the eventful season which has just finished.

It is immediately obvious, for example, that there was a considerable variance in the playing strength of the teams surviving both for the Championship and to avoid relegation.

For example Wolves — the new Champions — scored 103 goals and lost only 47 in 103 League matches they played. This means that the fans who watched the Wolves in their brilliant run to the title saw 103 goals scored.

It is rather interesting to compare this with the fare served up by Manchester City, who finished four places lower down the table. The City players managed to get the ball into their opponents' net on 104 occasions, but against this they lost 100 goals to themselves.

However, this means that those who watched their games saw 204 goals scored, which is 94 more than fans saw who followed the Champions.

Intriguing

This raises a most intriguing point and leads one to wonder what a staunch fan wants. Does he want to see his own side win irrespective of the score... or does he want to see goals, goals, and more goals on the basis that a 0-5 victory is better entertainment than a 1-0 success.

Getting the ball into the net is basically the whole object of the game and there are those who are applauding the new "more goals" policy adopted by the more enterprising teams like Manchester City.

There are many more fascinating examples of these sorts of things in the final League tables and if you have a few minutes to spare I am sure you will find them most enlightening if you care to give them a few minutes to study. In these days of vital statistics there are none more vital than in Football League tables. Have a look and see for yourself.

From Clay Pit To Wembley — The Story Of Manchester United

By TIM GORDON

Walking into the main entrance of Manchester United's ground at Old Trafford is like walking into a modern hotel. Bright colours in the contemporary style, a sumptuous lounge for soccer VIP's and down below first-class dressing-room accommodation for Manchester United's young team known all over the football world as the "Busby Babes."

Nothing but the best is good enough for Manchester United, which has been the most consistently good side in post-war football. Yet it was not always so.

The club was founded over 70 years ago by a group of Manchester wagon-makers who worked on the old Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

Like the humble men they were, they called their football club simply Newton Heath. Railwaysmen were not exactly rich, and there was a story road to tread before the new football club was established.

The team played its home games on an old clay pit. At first it could not afford to play away matches.

These old wagon-makers would go wide-eyed with wonder if they could see the present Manchester United side, travelling to its away games in a luxurious coach equipped with a radio and card-tables.

Met By Candlelight

Yet in those early days, so poor was the Newton Heath club that it went bankrupt. The committee switched its meetings from a public house to a schoolroom. When the gas bills weren't paid and the local council cut off the gas supply, the meetings were conducted by candlelight.

When the club moved to Bank Lane, Clayton, it tried to play a game under artificial light. The experiment was not a resounding success. But the enterprise of those days lives on, for United was one of the first clubs to appreciate the value of floodlighting, and had it installed on the club's subsidiary ground at The Cliff, Broughton.

United's first-team ground at Old Trafford, bombed in the war, has now been fitted with the wing-half with Manchester City, the most modern floodlights, costing thousands of pounds.

Manchester United's officials have always been noted for their progressive ideas.

The year 1902 saw the end of Newton Heath club, and from the ruins rose the Manchester United club we know today.

Star Trio

Almost immediately after the changeover, the club had a remarkable run, rivaling its performances in recent times. In 1900, it was promoted from the Second Division to the First. Two years later, it won the First Division Championship; the following year, in 1909, it won the FA Cup; and in 1911, United ran off with the League Championship again.

On Manchester United's right wing in those days loomed the fabulous Welsh wizard, Billy Meredith, who had moved to United from its near-neighbour, Manchester City.

With Meredith were Sandy Turnbull and Charlie Roberts, a great centre-half still referred to reverently by old-time football fans.

After such spectacular playing success, the club moved to its present headquarters at Old Trafford. A grand total of £100,000 was one of the finest in the land when it was opened in 1910.

For a period in the 1920's, United still had great characters like Frank Barson, the iron man of soccer, and Joe Spencer with his flair for grabbing goals.

"Give it to Joe" was the clarion call from the terraces.

But the club which has won the Cup twice and the League four times did go on rebuilding with the same energy and courage as their forerunners had when they held meetings by candlelight.

(COPYRIGHT)

But in the next decade the voices grew steadily fainter, and in the early 1930's United touched rock-bottom. The future seemed as bleak that the once-glorious club looked like slipping into the Third Division North, or even out of football altogether.

To the rescue came a Manchester businessman, Mr. J. W. Glisson, who helped to put the club on a sound financial footing again.

When the club moved to Bank Lane, Clayton, it tried to play a game under artificial light. The experiment was not a resounding success. But the enterprise of those days lives on, for United was one of the first clubs to appreciate the value of floodlighting, and had it installed on the club's subsidiary ground at The Cliff, Broughton.

Now we have the Matt Busby, from Lancashire, who has given his name as a classic wing-half with Manchester City, the most modern floodlights, costing thousands of pounds.

Manchester United's officials have always been noted for their progressive ideas.

The year 1902 saw the end of Newton Heath club, and from the ruins rose the Manchester United club we know today.

A team which included such great players as Johnny Carey, Johnny Aston, Henry Cockburn, Jack Rowley, Stan Pearson, Johnny Morris, Charlie Mitten and Jimmy Delaney set up a new standard in post-war soccer. Some claimed its play was as good as any in the game's history.

In 1948 it won the Cup; in 1952, after being runners-up several times, United won the League Championship. In 1956, a new team built on the old principles brought the League pennant back to Old Trafford, and again in 1957.

But on February 6, 1958, when United were third in the League table and had hopes of winning it for the third time running, the worst calamity to befall British football killed seven United players and injured ten. The team were on their way home from Belgrade when their chartered airliner crashed in a snowstorm at Munich airport.

NATURE'S OWN SPECTACULAR SIGHT

HAVE YOU EVER SEEN the Northern Lights (Aurora Borealis)? If not, I am sure you must have heard of them.

They are seen in many changing shapes and colours in the night skies in the Northern Hemisphere.

Occasionally they can be detected in the northern parts of the United States and they have been seen as far south as New Orleans and Florida.

I will never forget the thrills I experienced as a child in Wisconsin when my mother would awaken me sometime around midnight and direct my gaze to the northern sky. Near the horizon it would witness a soft, colorful glow of light. At times it could almost be mistaken for the dawn.

The nearer you get to the Northern Lights, the more brilliant they become. At times they are brighter than moonlight.

It is said they furnish enough light for the hunter to pursue his seals and whales in the polar regions. It is even possible to read by them on occasion.

Perhaps they can best be described to you by comparing them with the brilliant shimmering curtain you have seen in your theatre with its soft graceful folds.

Although the basic colour is green, sometimes when they are bright, than usual, a red glow is apparent. Other colours are yellow, orange, violet, pink and grey. Seldom is any blue observed.

Often these colours take the shape of arcs or bands with flaming streaks shooting up through them. The streaks resemble the searchlights which sometimes go shooting across the sky.

Other displays take on the forms of crowns and at times look like a clover leaf. Serpentines are common. Occasionally these lights appear in rainbow effect. Then again, you may see them as just a formless mass of radiance.

The Northern Lights have been seen as far south as Florida.

Long, long ago, superstitious people feared this awesome sight, thinking it was an evil omen. That is because they did not understand the origin of the lights.

Today, although we still do not know as much as we would like about them, we are sure they are not light rays like the rainbow. Instead, they are caused by electrical particles from the sun. These particles appear to be forced out into the atmosphere from sunspots where they agitate thin gases that cause them to glow.

Sometimes you can compare the lights. It has been compared to the crushing of dry paper.

ARTHUR HAD LEARNED that hamsters like to prepare their own beds. After cleaning out the cage every few days, he would tear wide strips of newspaper for the cage and entertain himself by peeling at Dumpling as he held the paper between his tiny pink paws and busily tore it into bits with his teeth.

When Dumpling had chewed up enough paper to hide under, he backed into the pile, pulling pieces of paper with his teeth to cover his head.

When he awakened from sleep late in the afternoon, he opened his pink mouth in a wide yawn and peered around with half-closed eyes.

"To bears" is another name for hamsters, and Dumpling's fur was soft, thick and golden brown.

Arthur kept his pet in an unfinished room at the rear of the house, out of the winter weather and protected from the dogs. In the evenings, he usually let Dumpling out to scurry around the room while he kept an eye on his every move.

ARTHUR HAD LEARNED ALSO that hamsters are very restless after sleeping during the day. They can shoot out of sight while you turn your head, and are so small and supple they can squeeze through very small cracks or holes. When Dumpling sometimes squeezed himself behind a cabinet, Arthur noticed Dumpling out by leaving food where Dumpling could smell it.

When Dumpling managed to push up the door of his cage to escape at night (his normal play and feeding time), Arthur always found him the next morning sleeping in the sack of potatoes under the sink, with half-eaten potatoes around him. He could not find out how Dumpling got into the sink compartment. The metal doors were kept tightly closed, and the ventilators were high and had small slits.

Sometimes, Arthur kept Dumpling quiet enough to get by holding him in front of a mirror to sniff at his own image.

ONE COLD WINTER NIGHT Arthur and his father went to the back room and found Dumpling stretched out cold and stiff in spite of his paper hideout. The family gathered around and agreed that the pet was gone for good.

As Mother left the room she saw Arthur holding Dumpling in a cloth, like a baby, and looking very sad.

She took Dumpling from him, saying that she would attempt to revive him by leaving him wrapped warmly in the cloth and lying in a little box next to the hot water heater in the kitchen.

THE NEXT MORNING thinking she would find Dumpling still out cold, Mother rushed to the kitchen to remove him before Arthur awakened him. The box was empty! She was sure that poor Dumpling had struggled out of the box during the night to expire under the refrigerator or washing machine.

CROCODYLE ODDITY

Crocodiles can't chew. Small animals are swallowed whole. Large game is buried in the river bottom until it starts to rot, at which time it is easily swallowed. (Alexander Lake Killers in Africa.)

Baron Munch Is Packing

—He's Going To Visit Friends In Bungle Land

By MAX TRELL

KNAF, the Shadow Boy with the Turned About Name, with his sister, Handi, and Hiawatha, the Small-Sized Wooden Indian, rang the doorknob of their friend, Baron Munch.

Baron Munch lived in a very pretty house at the end of Book Boulevard, which ran behind the bookcase between Canary Cage Corner and Curtain Lane.

A few minutes later, they were inside Baron Munch's room. They found him packing his trunk.

A Long Trip

"I'm about to go on a long trip," he said. "I'm going to visit my friends who live in Bungle Land."

"Why do they do that?" asked Handi.

Bunglers plant their gardens at the bottom of the pond.

No Such Place

"Bungle, and?" asked Handi in a puzzled voice.

"It's on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean," said Baron Munch, "half-way between Europe and Africa and just around the corner from Asia."

Knarf asked if Baron Munch could show them where Bungle was on the map.

"Very amazing stupid people," muttered Hiawatha.

Hiawatha chuckled again.

"I suppose you might say that the Bunglers are very foolish but, just the same, they're very nice and very kind."

When someone comes to dinner, they not only give him lots to eat, they also give him the plates, the knives, the forks and the spoons.

Knarf and Handi and Hiawatha said good-bye to Baron Munch and wished him a very pleasant time on his visit to the Bunglers of Bungle Land. But all the way home, Hiawatha kept on muttering:

"Very stupid people to plant their gardens at the bottom of a pond and to give away knives and forks and spoons when you come to dinner."

Curious Things

Baron Munch chuckled as he remembered some of the curious things done by his friends the Bunglers.

"For example," he said, "when the Bunglers write a letter with pen and ink, they often stick the letter in the ink and mail the pen."

"Very foolish people," muttered Hiawatha.

"And they build their houses in a curious way," continued Baron Munch.

"They build the floors on the ceilings and the ceilings on the floors which makes them walk upside down like flies. And do you know where they plant their gardens?"

Knarf and Handi asked Baron Munch where his friends the Bunglers planted their gardens.

"They plant their gardens, Baron Munch said, 'at the bottom of a pond.'

YOUR BIRTHDAY ... By STELLA

SATURDAY, MAY 10

BORN today, you have almost prophetic insight, at times. This, combined with a keen mind, astute judgment and unusual versatility makes you a person who should rise to the top of the heap early in life. You have a high success potential. The stars have given you the talents. It is up to you to develop them to the utmost of your ability early in life.

Since you have a fine memory and a quick wit, you are an amusing conversationalist. You are apt to make your light talk conceal a more serious intent. You can deliver a scathing critical lecture with a smile. And people take it from you, too. Since you are original in your approach to life, there is seldom a dull moment wherever you happen to be. You are usually the life of any party. You are fond of social gaiety. This perhaps is something you must guard against—wasting precious energies on triviality.

Once you have learned to take life a little more seriously and appreciate the motto, "Life is real—life is earnest," then you have little to worry about; as far as solving the success formula. Just select the arch of expression which interests you most and carry on.

You probably will achieve a certain amount of financial security quite early in life. You have an affectionate and emotional nature and will be happiest if you wed while young and have a large family upon which you can lavish your attentions.

Among those born on this date were: Curtis Dwight Wilbur, jurist and statesman; James Gordon Bennett, noted newspaper owner; Kaufmann Kohler, educator; Fred Astaire, dancer and actor; and William R. Grace, steamship magnate and industrialist.

To find what the stars have in store for you tomorrow, select your birthday star and read the corresponding paragraph. Let your birthday star be your daily guide.

SUNDAY, MAY 11

TAURUS (Apr. 21-May 21)—The heavens appear somewhat confused, so be as calm as you can all the time. Stay in control of everything.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 23-Dec. 22)—There may be a difference of opinion today on some matter of importance. Be the conciliator.

GEMINI (May 22-June 21)—Approach any innovation with caution today. Conservative action is by far the best policy for you now.

CANCER (June 22-July 23)—Be tactful in dealing with others. Best not to trust impulse today, but act only upon considered opinion.

LEO (July 24-Aug. 23)—Rest body and mind today. Don't get into any dispute which could end up in a serious argument.

PISCES (Feb. 20-Mar. 20)—Personal affairs enter the picture and come up for close attention. Be co-operative rather than starting a ruckus.

ARIES (Mar. 21-Apr. 20)—The day is full of confusion, but you can smooth things out if you are pliable and diplomatic with others.

LIBRA (Sept. 24-Oct. 23)—The best laid plans can be upset unexpectedly, but you can adapt to changes if you are diplomatic.

BORN today, you have an original and inventive mind which, when combined with a good head for business, should bring you success fairly early in life. Whether it also brings fame will depend in some degree upon the type of work you undertake. The stars have given you mental agility as well as mechanical ability and you might develop whatever appeals to you most. You enjoy the arts as well as the sciences. Your major problem one is concentration to a single objective, rather than spreading your energies over too wide a field.

You have a darkling, magnetic personality which draws people into your orbit unconsciously. You have an almost fatal attraction for the opposite sex and will have many admirers. However, your loyalties are deep and true. Once you have set your heart and mind on a single individual as a life-partner, you will be faithful to your choice. It is quite possible that you will fall in love at first sight, wed suddenly, and have a lifetime of happiness and contentment.

Your path through life may not always be an easy one, for success seems to come to you in alternating cycles. It is important that you hold to an optimistic point of view, whatever happens. For with you there is always a better tomorrow. You can practically depend on that!

You have strong likes and dislikes and usually know at once whether or not you are going to get along with a new acquaintance. You are not one to easily forgive a slight, either. You make no good enemy as do a friend!

Among those born on this date were: Edele Shannon, actress; Ottmar Mergenthaler, inventor of typesetting machine; Irving Berlin, composer; and Robert C. Sands, author and poet.

To find what the stars have in store for you tomorrow, select your birthday star and read the corresponding paragraph. Let your birthday star be your daily guide.

MONDAY, MAY 12

TAURUS (Apr. 21-May 21)—This is an active day. Use every moment and accomplish much that needs to be done. Make final arrangements for a trip.

GEMINI (May 22-June 21)—Some unusual honour may be in store for you. Perhaps you have a promotion coming and today is the day it is due.

CANCER (June 22-July 23)—Promote a new and interesting romance. It may be exactly what you have been waiting for all your life.

LEO (July 24-Aug. 23)—You may start the new work week advantageously by taking a calculated risk which could bring increased profit.

VIRGO (Aug. 24-Sept. 23)—This is no day to sit back and watch the world go by, your door! Get out there and take positive action yourself.

LIBRA (Sept. 24-Oct. 23)—Take the initiative in something important to your career. Be assertive, original and play a long shot!

SCORPIO (Oct. 24-Nov. 23)—You have the green light today. Get started on an important project and make fine progress.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 23-Dec. 22)—One of those days when it may pay to play a hunch, even if you can't give a good reason for doing it.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 23-Jan. 20)—Make a good profit on a deal. Don't take outside advice, but follow your own intuitions, in the matter.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 21-Feb. 18)—A definite upswing in your personal and business affairs. Take full advantage of the propitious.

FISCHES (Feb. 19-Mar. 20)—Concentrate on significant matters that have a real bearing on your future security. Expect and get results.

ARIES (Mar. 21-Apr. 20)—Concentrate on important things. Non-essentials should be postponed or discarded indefinitely.
